I reiterate that claim to-day and I make it in the presence of gentlemen who have served with me upon that committee and who know the facts about it. This popular child may have many stepfathers; I have no objection to that. I am perfectly willing to serve equally with all of them as partners in building this most beneficent service to its present high standard. Fifty thousand dollars a year was being appropriated to establish rural delivery for about 20,000,000 people. I offered a bill at that session of Congress to appropriate $1,000,000, and I tried in my humble way to press it before the committee. If I had known as much about legislation here then as I know now I would not have pressed it before the committee. I would have offered it here on the floor, where all can see and know what happens. At any rate, while I was urging the bill before the committee a good friend, not now a Member, said, "My friend from Georgia will know what a failure rural free delivery is after a few years' service here." I replied to that in my feeble way, because I was then nothing but a new Member, that the Post-Office Department would be a failure with an appropriation of only $50,000 a year; that this great Republic would be a failure on an appropriation so insignificant and so inadequate.

It was soon found out that some of us on that committee were going to press that million-dollar bill in this House as an amendment to the appropriation bill. Not very long after that it was suggested to me that the Post-Office Department could not spend quite that amount, and we agreed, I think it was, on $250,000. The Department probably could spend no more than that amount the first year of any great increase in an entirely new direction. I have not looked up the figures, but my recollection is that the House appropriated $250,000 that year for this service. The next year we forced the appropriation up near the million-dollar mark. From that day until this there has not been an opponent of rural free delivery on the Post-Office Committee or in the House of Representatives, and when I referred to the declaration of my friend from Georgia, who said that I had stated in a jesting way on this floor that I was simply the stepfather of the service, I meant this, that I was proud of the fact that I have been one of seventeen men who have stood behind and built up that great service. Indeed, I may say seven men, because the work, as everybody knows, is done largely by the subcommittee. I seek to detract nothing from the laurels of anybody. I simply know that I took up my work on that committee with all of the ability and all of the force and all of the energy that I had. After establishing rural delivery the deficit increased for several years and a great many people got afraid of it. The deficit in the Post-Office Department went up from $4,000,000 to $17,000.000 a year, and it was freely charged in many quarters that it was due to the rural free-delivery service, but with that same service increasing in appropriations every year, until this year the appropriation for rural delivery is about $35,000,000, the deficit has gone down from $17,000,000 to $6,000,000.

Somebody has done good service. Whether without rural delivery the deficit would have so decreased that the Post-Office Department would now be paying its way, I do not know and I do not care, but nobody can tell, because it would be impossible for anybody to decide with any sort of accuracy where a profit comes from to the Post-Office Department. Our great cities have said and the Members here have often insisted that the post-office in New York, for illustration, pays its expenses and pays a large profit into the Treasury. I see my friend from Brooklyn who, I doubt not, believes that the Brooklyn post-office pays a great surplus into the Treasury of the United States. It does pay more money into the Treasury than it takes out of it. It does all of that. But what of the great expense in carrying the New York mails to and from the smaller offices all over the land? After deducting the cost of carrying mails to and from New York from all the small towns and cities so far away, New York might still pay a surplus, but who can count the cost of carrying a letter sent from the city of New York to the city of El Paso, Tex., and that must be taken into consideration.

We can not therefore say that any one service, any one city, any one of the Departments contributes more than it takes from the Treasury.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a fact that all the estimates of the importance of offices are based upon receipts?

Mr. GRIGGS. Oh, yes; it is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And that is the only method by which any accurate test can be had of the importance of the office?

Mr. GRIGGS. I say that is the only method by which you ascertain anything about it accurately—I mean with any sort of accuracy—but that does not make it accurate. You can not determine it exactly, because a large part of the railway mail pay, which is over $45,000,000 this year, for carrying the mail from and to the city of New York, from two to five thousand miles, probably costs five times the return carrying it in some sections of the country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would it not be possible to have some computation made of the percentage of mail carried out of the city compared with the mail carried within the city?

Mr. GRIGGS. Oh, yes; I think my friend could compute almost anything himself on the subject, and I will leave him to make this computation, as I am a little pressed for time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest would it not be possible to determine how much mail was carried each way?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption at this point?

Mr. GRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have just been in conversation with the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, who told me something which I did not expect to hear about the deficit which the gentleman has been discussing. The chairman of the Post-Office Committee informs me that the Post-Office Department this year would have been self-supporting had it not been for the increases of the salaries in the Post-Office Department which Congress voted a year ago, increasing the whole list in the Post-Office Department, officials and employees, by an amount that would meet the deficit this year.

Mr. GRIGGS. I am very glad to hear that, because it gives proof in support of the statement made by me a few moments ago. Of this increase of salaries $6,000,000 in round numbers went to rural carriers, and nobody begrudges that.

Mr. Chairman, I have never been one of those people who believe that the Post-Office Department should be required to pay its own way. I take no pride in the fact that the post-office in my little town pays more than its expenses. I have never worried over what the Post-Office Department costs when compared with efficient service. I never was in favor of throwing other people's money away, and I do not believe that this committee has ever thrown away a dollar of money, and it will not now do so in the making of greater efficiency in the postal service. I have heard a great many people say that the Post-Office Department should be required to pay its own way.

Who has ever suggested that the Navy Department should pay its own way? Who has ever suggested that the War Department, or any other great Department of this Government, should pay its own way? To suggest that the War Department or the Navy Department should do it would mean that they would have to loot and rob as they did ages ago. [Applause.] Why should this great Department—the Department nearest the people, the one that enters all the homes of the country, which carries education and enlightenment into all our homes, the Department that carries its missives from one home to another, sometimes bearing sorrows and oftener joys—why should it be required to pay its own way? Why it is absolute folly even to discuss it. [Applause.]

While I am very much delighted to know that the Department has decreased the deficit from $17,000,000 to $6,000,000, equal to about the increase last year in rural carriers' salaries, I am simply delighted because it shows honesty and good business ability, both on the part of the Department and the gentlemen who form this committee.

A few years ago the Department made an effort to get at the cost of rural delivery, not the cost on particular routes, but the average cost per route. It had to be an estimate to some extent, but it is almost exact. They found that they collected an average of $120 per annum from the sale of stamps, and the returns from mails estimated to be delivered on each route was $260, a total cost of $380. To make it clear, the Government collected $120 from the outgoing mail and $260 from the incoming mail. The cost now outside of any expenses in the way of clerks in post-offices, is $900 per route in the country, leaving an apparent deficit on every rural route of the difference between $900 and $380—$520.

I come now to a question which I wish I had time to discuss at much greater length than I am going to this afternoon, the question of increasing the revenue from these routes and at the same time increasing their efficiency. I refer to the establishment of a parcels post limited to rural routes. I have introduced a bill on that subject, which I will read:

"A bill (H. R. 15458) providing for a parcels post for rural routes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That beginning July 1, 1908, there shall be a parcels post limited to 12 pounds on every rural route in the United States. Said parcels post shall be confined exclusively to the rural route upon which the parcel originates and its rural route connections, and shall not extend beyond said route upon which it originates and routes with which said route connects directly without the intervention of railway mail service, star route, messenger, or any other form of mail service.

"SEC. 2. That the rate of postage on such packages shall be 5 cents for packages weighing not more than 3 pounds, 7 cents for packages weighing not more than 5 pounds, 10 cents for packages weighing more than 5 and not more than 8 pounds, and 15 cents for all packages weighing more than 8 and not more than 12 pounds."

This bill speaks for itself and ought to become the law in some shape immediately. [Loud applause.]

Now, gentlemen, you may say what you please, and our friends on the other side of this aisle may dally over it as long as they please. The people of the country have had a taste of good mail service and they propose to have the best. To the people of the small towns, to the country merchants, and to the farmers this will be a boon unspeakable. It is theirs, and of right they ought to have it. [Applause.] And I may as well tell you they are going to have it. [Applause.]

And when they get it I may say that I made the first speech in Congress for it. I shall add to that, however, that I was only one of many who could and did give it to them. [Applause.] The people are determined on this question. A day or two since, a newspaper man asked my position on this question, and after I gave it to him, I inquired, "How many opinions have you got on it?" He was polling the House, and he said, "Out of two hundred and fifty-six I have only fifty." I know that many Members refuse to be polled on all questions. I often refuse, myself, but if you gentlemen are afraid to express your opinions on this question you may just as well know now, as to find out in defeat later, that the people are going to have it if they have to send some one here in your places to get it for them. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of California. Will you allow an interruption?

Mr. GRIGGS. Why, certainly.

Mr. SMITH of California. How long do you think the people of this country would be satisfied with the limited parcels post that you have indicated? Or is that intended to be its ultimate object? I am not asking this for a catch question, but is it intended to be an entering wedge, that we may gradually extend into a universal parcels post?

Mr. GRIGGS. I will say to the gentleman that he can not ask me any catch questions, in the first place.

Mr. SMITH of California. I do not intend to.

Mr. GRIGGS. And he would not intend to, in the second place.

Mr. SMITH of California. That is what I said.

Mr. GRIGGS. I do not know. In my opinion it is not intended as an entering wedge.

Mr. SMITH of California. You say it is not?

Mr. GRIGGS. Not in my opinion; no. It is a convenience that the farmers and merchants of this country want; they need it, and it will increase the efficiency of rural delivery and decrease the net expense of rural delivery. [Applause.] I do not know what an entering wedge is, so far as that is concerned, because good legislation ought to be enacted whether or not it is an entering wedge into other legislation that some people do not want.

Mr. SMITH of California. I have had a good many farmers and villagers talk to me about the parcels post, and in favor of it, but I never in my life had one of them suggest a parcels post limited to the rural routes. I never had one of them intimate that he wanted a parcels post for the purpose of more convenient trading at home, but the idea has been that they may send off to Chicago and New York and other large centers for the things they do not find at the local stores.

Mr. HARDY. If this should prove an entering wedge, is there any reason on earth why the Government should not receive the profits of the parcels post up to 11 pounds instead of the express companies as they now exist?

Mr. GRIGGS. I will say to the gentleman on that question what I said a moment ago, that it does not matter to me whether good and proper legislation is an entering wedge to what some people may consider bad legislation in the future or not. I will let my friend make that statement if he desires to do so. I want to say this, however, simply as information which I happened to get the other day, the source of which I can not now disclose, but will if it is necessary, that at least one express company going out of Chicago has lately carried a package with the expressage prepaid on it by a large mail-order house to a town in Kansas, about 600 miles away, for 16 cents, the statement being made on the bill "we have paid the express charges because we can get a cheaper rate than you can." And certainly with a parcels post from Chicago to that town in Kansas, the cost of carrying that bundle by mail would have been as much as that.

Mr. HARDY. Another question. Is it not a fact that the express companies to-day, instead of lowering their rates per pound as a bundle increases in weight, actually raise the rate after it gets beyond 4 pounds now?

Mr. GRIGGS. I do not know about that. I am only telling what I know to-day. [Laughter.] I believe the parcels post to be one of the biggest and most pressing questions before this House, and I have tried not to talk any politics along with it. In fact, I have only had occasion to mention during this talk the dallying of my friends on the other side of that aisle about it. They will probably do with this as they did with rural free delivery. After Judge MOON and my good friend Mr. SPERRY, Judge FINLEY, General BINGHAM, Joe Sibley, and Tom Hedge—both of blessed memory—and several others of us had made rural delivery a pronounced success without an opponent anywhere in this broad land, the Republican convention met in Philadelphia and promised rural delivery to the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And after we on this side establish the parcels post on rural routes I have not the slightest doubt that when you are making the next Republican platform you will promise to give the people of the United States a rural-delivery parcels post.

There are several of these bills introduced in the House. I have no personal pride in my bill. I would about as soon have the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] as to have mine. I do not think the Post-Office Department bill is the best one on the subject. It has too many words and says too little. This is a great fault with several of them. I do not like the bill of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY], who has introduced three bills. He is too loose in his language. For instance, he provides at one point in the bill to limit the size of the parcels to that of an ordinary suit case. [Laughter.] Why, gentlemen, there isn't a postmaster in all the section of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that would know what that meant. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Was the gentleman from Georgia ever in my section of the country?

Mr. GRIGGS. I went to school in Nashville three years, graduated there, and passed through the gentleman's country several times going there. It is a beautiful country.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman went very much out of his way.

Mr. GRIGGS. Why, in that part of the country they would call it "satchel." [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman will allow me one question. Is it not a fact that the bill I had the honor to introduce is the only one that provides for an increase in the rural carriers' salary, provided the parcels post is established?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Does not the gentleman like that feature of it?

Mr. GRIGGS. Yes; I like all of the gentleman's bill.

Mr. SIMS. I thank the gentleman from Georgia, for his opinion has very great weight. And now he can say anything he pleases about me. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRIGGS. I was about to say that if my friend from Tennessee would take the extremely verbose first section out of his bill and insert mine, which the gentleman himself admits is very clear and concise, I will accept his bill and offer it as an amendment to the post-office appropriation bill just as soon as we get to it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the long service of the gentleman from Georgia, I would take any suggestion that would benefit my bill in the least. I want results and not words.

Mr. GRIGGS. That is right; I believe that. I have listened to many words and seen a great many good results from my friend from Tennessee on the floor of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I have not all the time at my command to-day to discuss these matters as I would like to discuss them, but before I conclude, let me say that the greatest pride of my whole life is and shall always be the part I have played in the establishment of quick and prompt communication between the people of the towns and the country. Both are necessary to our civilization and our progress. Neither could long exist without the other. Happy is the man who never forgets either of the statements just made. The farmer is often the "forgotten man." Under the benign influence of the telephone and rural mail delivery the friction long existent between the town and the country is rapidly passing away. Add to these the blessing of the parcels post and the drift of our boys and girls to the towns will immediately change to the country, the great, broad, blessed country, where God always seems nearer and where communion with nature is easiest. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I promised not to speak over thirty minutes, and I ask—— [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!" from all sides.] Gentlemen, I have really concluded the greater part of that which I desired to say, and ask permission only to add to my remarks——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GRIGGS. I desire to include as part of my remarks a letter from the Postmaster-General to me:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1908.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It affords me great pleasure, in compliance with your request, to write you concerning the proposed extension of the parcel post.

It does not appear to be generally known that a comprehensive system of parcel post is at this moment in satisfactory operation in most foreign countries. The limit of weight fixed in a number of them is shown:

Great Britain, 11 pounds; Germany, 110 pounds; France, 22 pounds; Italy, 11 pounds; Chile, 11 pounds; New Zealand, 11 pounds; Austria, 110 pounds; Belgium, 132 pounds; The Netherlands, 11 pounds; Cuba, 11 pounds.

The parcel-post rate in all of these countries is lower, in many instances materially lower, than the rate (12 cents a pound) which has been recommended for the general parcel post in the United States.

The present rate on the general parcel post is 16 cents a pound for people in our own country, the limit of weight being 4 pounds, while the rate from the United States to twenty-nine foreign countries is 12 cents a pound, and the limit of weight to 24 of these countries is 11 pounds. In order to have the rate consistent and more equitable the Department has recommended that on packages for delivery in this country it shall be the same as on those sent abroad, namely, 12 cents a pound, a reduction of 4 cents, and the weight limit 11 pounds, an increase of 7 pounds; also:

	Cents.
For 1 ounce	1
Over 1 ounce and not exceeding 3 ounces	2
Over 3 ounces and not exceeding 4 ounces	3
Over 4 and not exceeding 5 ounces	4
Over 5 and not exceeding 6 ounces	5
Over 6 and not exceeding 8 ounces	6
Over 8 and not exceeding 12 ounces	9
Over 12 and not exceeding 16 ounces	12

In my annual report I recommended, in addition to the foregoing, a local parcels post on rural routes, at the rate of 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound or fractional part of an additional pound up to 11 pounds; and—

	Cents.
For 2 ounces or less	1
Over 2 and up to 4 ounces	2
Over 4 and up to 8 ounces	3
Over 8 and up to 12 ounces	4
Over 12 ounces and up to 1 pound	5

The object of this recommendation is to enable the local merchants to hold and increase their trade on the rural routes, to give to the farmers and patrons of these routes the accommodations which the machinery of the rural service, utilized to a greater extent than at present, will permit.

It is possible to offer these low rates for special local rural parcels post for the reason that, there being no railroad transportation, its operation would involve no additional expense. The necessary machinery is already in existence. There are over 38,000 rural routes in operation, supplying about fifteen millions of people, and even at the rates proposed it would require only three packages of the maximum weight to be taken out each trip over these routes in order to wipe out the deficit of the postal service. The increased cancellations would automatically raise the salaries of postmasters of the fourth class and the establishment of this special service would finally be instrumental in making the rural routes self-sustaining. The rural service will, in all probability, cost the Government this year $34,000,000, an increase of $10,000,000 over last year, and yet the benefits derived therefrom can not be measured in dollars and cents. A local parcels post on rural routes would aid in bringing about the improvement of the roads throughout the country, thus adding to the valuation of the farms, with increased accommodations afforded by the service and better roads. That it would be of material advantage to the retail merchant in competition with the mail-order houses is seen at once when it is pointed out that the latter, at the proposed general parcels-post rate of 12 cents a pound would be obliged to pay $1.32 for sending an 11-pound package to a rural route patron, a difference in favor of the local storekeeper of about 10 cents a pound, or $1.07 on an 11-pound package.

Objections have been raised in various quarters to the measures which the Department is advocating, and wherever these are not obviously the outcome of selfish motives they have been answered. Although no sound argument has yet been advanced in opposition, the contentions which have been made are not without interest. I mention the more important of them, at the same time giving the replies which they have elicited.

It has been stated that the Department is not equipped to deliver 11-pound parcels received in the general mails. The present regulations provide that where a package is of undue size or weight a formal notice shall be sent to the addressee to call for it. This practice would continue were the weight limit increased to 11 pounds in the case of offices having free delivery. Nor would it work a hardship, for under the present weight limit of 4 pounds the average weight of parcels sent through the mails is but one-third of a pound. Increasing the weight limit would not have nearly as great an effect on the average weight of parcels mailed as seems to be commonly supposed. Where parcels were addressed to persons living on rural routes they would, of course, be delivered by the rural carriers, who would not thereby be inconvenienced, to the boxes of the patrons.

It has been claimed that the special local rate recommended for packages handled on rural routes would eventually be made applicable to the entire postal service. The impossibility of this becomes apparent when attention is directed to the cost of railroad transportation, which has no part in the former service. About $45,000,000 were paid last year for mail transportation and $6,000,000 for postal cars.

Others have said that large mail-order houses would, under the proposed law, utilize the special parcel post on rural routes through agents to the great disadvantage of the country merchant. The Department recommends a provision which will prevent any such use of the routes; this is indicated by the clauses which have been underlined on page 2 of the inclosed draft of a bill. Even in the absence of a specific prohibition of this nature it should be remembered that any systematic attempt upon the part of a mail-order house to thus distribute its wares would necessitate the employment of many thousands of local representatives. The catalogues of these concerns show pretty plainly that they attribute their success in large measure to their remarkably low-selling expense, and that the absence of any sort of agents is the principal feature of their argument in accounting for the supposedly law prices of their goods.

The cry of "class legislation" has also been raised. There is, of course, no discrimination involved, for all who can be reached by rural carriers will be accommodated. It would be as logical to decry the laws which permit the delivery of mail to patrons living on rural routes, while persons differently situated are obliged to make a trip to a near-by post-office to obtain their letters.

Demands for a reasonable extension of the parcel post are being received from all sections of the country. Many commercial bodies formerly opposed to any action of this kind are now heartily in favor of it.

Believe me, faithfully yours, G. v. L. MEYER.

Hon. JAMES M. GRIGGS,
Richmond Hotel, Washington.

I disagree with the Department in the rates proposed. I think they are too high. I include also a letter from Mr. George De Brosse, president of the rural carriers of Georgia, showing how the carriers and the people feel about the parcels post:

EDITOR UNION NEWS:

As you kindly invited me some time since to use your columns, I will now attempt to write.

I want to say in the beginning that the farmer and the rural letter carrier should be, in my humble opinion, very close to each other, and I assure you that we carriers are at all times willing to go to the extent of our authority to accommodate our greatest friends, the men who guide the plow.

The farmers want and need a parcels delivery at a low rate of postage to apply only over rural routes, and we rural carriers, seeing the need of this cheap parcels delivery and realizing the great convenience it would be to the man who plows, hoes, rakes, and mows, and during the busy season works from dawn to dark and has no time to go to town shopping, but nevertheless needs little articles from time to time. Knowing it will make our burden heavier, we are anxious for him to have this convenience. Why? Simply because we want the farmer to have as good service as possible, though it does work us harder. We want the rural free-delivery service to come as near giving the rural citizens the conveniences of the city as is possible.

We rural carriers are proud of the service and want to make it the very best possible. We want the farmer to have his daily paper and market reports with his noon meal and to be able to dispatch letters to his relatives and friends promptly. We want him to be able to have small parcels delivered at his door at a nominal cost.

Therefore we, at our last national convention, indorsed the proposed plan of Postmaster-General Meyer for a parcels delivery for rural routes, and we want it to speedily become effective.

Now, then, we want good roads over which to haul these parcels, and we want our friends and patrons, the farmers, to help us secure better roads. Good roads are more beneficial to the farmers than anyone else, because his crops are marketed over the country highways. It is not necessary to assert that good roads enhance the value of property which is situated on them. This is a well-established fact. All roads traveled by rural free-delivery carriers should by all means be made public roads, and the carriers of Georgia are anxious that some action be taken to effect this. And if the farmers appreciate the rural free-delivery service like they think they do, I think we will have their cooperation in obtaining this. As much as we love our patrons, we are forced to acknowledge that some farmers are awfully careless about what kind of roads their carrier has to travel. I know some who make the public highway a dumping ground for grubs, roots, brickbats, old bones, plows, fence rails, etc., and would not cut a fallen tree out of the carrier's way so he could pass unless they paid for it. When I find a man like this, I know he does not appreciate the splendid mail service he is getting. However, this is the exception and not the rule. Now, brother farmer, we want to give you the best service possible and want your help and cooperation.

With best wishes for the Union News and the Farmers' Union of Georgia.

Yours, truly, GEORGE DE BROSSE,
President Rural Letter Carriers' Association of Georgia.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SPERRY] are engaged in settling the parentage of the rural free delivery. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, every session when a Member of Congress comes into this Chamber, he finds in his desk the most beautiful volume issued by this Government. Sometimes is is bound in brown, sometimes in red, and sometimes in green. This year it is bound flexibly in black; it is made up of Jefferson's Manual, the rules of the House, the Constitution, and a digest of the practice and rules of the House. It seems to be the same every year, viewed casually and superficially, but as a matter of fact, it is not the same every year. Scrutiny will show that it changes, and the book that I hold in my hand to-day is not an exact copy of the book that we found here a year ago.

Here is one addition that I wish to call attention to. On page 718 in the Digest of the Practice and Rules of the House it reads as follows:

Instance wherein, on a motion to suspend the rules, the House ordered the Clerk to incorporate in the engrossment of a general appropriation bill already passed a provision embodying legislation.

That is a rock, Mr. Chairman. The long path of possible legislation in Washington is a narrow one; it is dark and tortuous; it has a rocky bottom and jagged sides. It is a far cry from the wide portals of the little wicker basket where a bill is introduced to the moving finger which approves at the other end of the avenue. And, believing as I do, that I was indirectly instrumental in adding one jagged rock to that narrow pathway to tear the bleeding feet of some weary wayfarer in another Congress, I regret it. [Applause.] Because the little rule of practice which I read will be in the future a rock to some weary foot, and it is significant of another thing which I am going to use as my text, something out of the post-office appropriation bill and apropos to this hour.

For the purpose of weighing the mails the country is divided into four sections, and a weighing takes place once in each section every four years. Last year the mail was weighed in the third section. By reason of the use of a new divisor in the Department, a change Congress refused to make and the Department made itself, the pay in that section is $1,787,378.10 less this year than it would have been had the old divisor been used—a 9.65 per cent decrease. In the same section the decrease in pay by reason of the change by Congress last year in rates for weights above 5,000 pounds is $759,145,88, or 4.10 per cent.

Over all sections, when the changes shall have been made, the use of the new divisor will make a decrease of $4,619,285.85 per annum, the law changing the rates makes a change of $1,740,494.63 per annum, the law reducing railway post-office pay makes a change of $935,974.09, and the effect of the withdrawal of equipment will make a change of $805,679.13. Altogether, then, the pay for the carriage of the mails will have been reduced, when all sections have been weighed, to the extent of $8,101,433.70 per annum.

Over 50 per cent of this decrease is due to the use of the new divisor, and the Department should be congratulated upon its use.

I maintain that the practice of taking the average daily weight by weighing the mails for seven days and then dividing by six was in gross error, not mitigated in the least because it obtained for thirty-four years.

I have shown that the general per cent of decrease by its use is 9.65. But that does not tell the story precisely. On the larger routes, which get the bulk of mail and the heavy pay, the rate of decrease, by reason of the corrected divisor, is much greater.

Take, for example, route No. 13095, being the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad from Buffalo to Chicago. The use of the corrected divisor in that instance makes a difference of 12.19 per cent—that is, we are paying on that one route $280,904.93 pef annum less than we would have paid had not the corrected divisor been adopted. If the old divisor had been used we would have paid this one route in the next four years $1,123,000 more than we will pay it.

The question has been asked if the reductions have impaired in any way the efficiency of the service. The representative of the Department has answered that the Department does not believe the reductions have impaired the service.

I desire to ask leave to print in connection with what I have just said two tables, one showing the amount of decrease in pay incident to the divisor and change of law in all four sections, and the second a table showing the effect of the same agencies upon a single route.

I also desire to print the opinion of the Attorney-General on the divisor at the conclusion of my remarks.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are other considerations brought out in the story of the divisor which are much more serious to me than any expenditure of money, and they relate to the processes of legislation.

Let me by way of preface relate the legislative history of the divisor in the Fifty-ninth Congress. On December 11, 1906, I put before the House the fact that for thirty-four years the Department had been weighing mails for seven days, in respect to over 90 per cent of the weight of mails, and to get an average daily weight had been dividing by six, omitting Sunday in the divisor, including Sunday weights in the dividend, and so securing an enlarged and erroneous quotient.

A short time thereafter the then Second Assistant Postmaster-General, W. S. Shallenberger, put before the House Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads a defense of the practice, concluding a long document in these words:

In view of this condition of the service, the intention of the law as disclosed by the history of the subject and the practice and construction placed upon it by the executive officers who were charged with its execution, of the contemporaneous declaration that in this respect the law adopted the practice which existed before its passage, and of the long-continued and unbroken maintenance of this construction upon the highest legal authority, I have to submit that the average daily weight as ascertained by the existing practice of the Department is the correct one contemplated by the statute.

This being the position of the officer in charge of the matter, the majority of the committee in the regular appropriation bill reported a paragraph containing three items in regard to railway mail pay. The paragraph was as follows:

The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1907, for the transportation of mails on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of upward of 5,000 pounds by making the following reductions from the present rates per mile per annum for the transportation of mails on such routes: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of more than 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds, 5 per cent; 48,000 pounds and less than 80,000 pounds, 10 per cent; and $10 additional for every additional 2,000 pounds: Provided, That hereafter the average weight per day be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive days, not less than one hundred and five, at such times and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct: Provided further, That hereafter, at the time of the weighing of the mails at the periods required by law, empty mail bags shall not be weighed nor taken as any part of the total weight of the mails in estimating the pay for transportation of said mails.

These were all changes of law and subject to points of order. In the divisor proviso the word "working" had been omitted, as the Department based the practice of a lesser divisor on its existence.

On February 18, 1907, it was moved to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

Resolved, That immediately upon the final passage of the bill (H. R. 25483) making appropriations for the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes, it shall be in order in the House to offer the following, under the conditions prescribed in Rule XXVIII, covering suspension of the rules:

Ordered, That in the engrossment of the bill (H. R. 25483) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes, the Clerk be directed to insert after the paragraph of appropriation "for inland transportation by railroad route, $44,660,000," the following:

"The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1907, for the transportation of mail on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of upward of 5,000 pounds by making the following changes in the present rates per mile per annum for the transportation of mail on such routes, and hereafter the rates on such routes shall be as follows: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds the rate shall be 5 per cent less than the present rates on all weight carried in excess of 5,000 pounds; and on routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 48,000 pounds the rate shall be 5 per cent less than the present rates on all weight carried in excess of 5,000 pounds up to 48,000 pounds, and for each additional 2,000 pounds in excess of 48,000 pounds at the rate of $19.24 upon all roads other than land-grant roads, and upon all land-grant roads the rate shall be $17.10 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of said 48,000 pounds.

"That after July 1, 1907, additional pay allowed for every line comprising a daily trip each way of railway post-office cars shall be at a rate not exceeding $25 per mile per annum for cars 40 feet in length and $27.50 per mile per annum for 45-foot cars, and $32.50 per mile for 50-foot cars, and $40 per mile per annum for cars 55 feet or more in length."

This resolution contained two of the four propositions reported out of committee, one of them changed to some extent. It was offered individually. It provided that after the bill had finally passed, a clerk could then add to the bill two provisions of great moment. The resolution was adopted by the House.

Later the House, in the Committee of the Whole, began the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule, and on February 20 I offered the following amendment to the item of railway mail pay.

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended in payment for transportation of the mails by railroad routes where the average weight of mails per day has been computed by the use of a divisor less than the whole number of days such mails have been weighed.

I did not believe this was a change of law or was subject to a point of order. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole sustained the point of order made against it. I appealed from the decision of the Chair. There were 72 votes for sustaining the Chair and 14 against.

Immediately after the paragraph containing the three provisions in the bill as reported by the committee went out on points of order.

Later on the same day the Committee on Rules submitted a privileged report restoring, in an amendment to the bill, a large number of items relating to the pay of employees, items which had gone out of the bill on points of order. No item relating to railway mail pay was submitted by the Committee on Rules.

Later in the same day the bill was reported by the Committee of the Whole to the House and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed, in the language of the RECORD, it was read the third time and passed. Then a motion was made to suspend the rules and pass the following order:

Ordered, That in the engrossment of the bill (H. R. 25483) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes, the Clerk be directed to insert after the paragraph of appropriation "for inland transportation by railroad route, $44,660,000;" the following:

"The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1907, for the transportation of mail on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of upward of 5,000 pounds by making the following changes in the present rates per mile per annum for the transportation of mail on such routes, and hereafter the rates on such routes shall be as follows: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds the rate shall be 5 per cent less than the present rates on all weight carried in excess of 5,000 pounds; and on routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 48,000 pounds the rate shall be 5 per cent less than the present rates on all weight carried in excess of 5,000 pounds up to 48,000 pounds, and for each additional 2,000 pounds in excess of 48,000 pounds at the rate of $19.24 upon all roads other than land-grant roads, and upon all land-grant roads the rate shall be $17.10 for each 2,000 pounds carried in excess of said 48,000 pounds.

"That after July 1, 1907, additional pay allowed for every line comprising a daily trip each way of railway post-office cars shall be at a rate not exceeding $25 per mile per annum for cars 40 feet in length and $27.50 per mile per annum for 45-foot cars, and $32.50 per mile for 50-foot cars, and $40 per mile per annum for cars 55 feet or more in length."

It is presumed that the Clerk, after the final passage of the bill, added the items. They appeared in the bill when it went to the Senate. There a divisor amendment offered by Senator LA FOLLETTE was inserted without debate. When the bill reached the House an attempt was made to adopt the Senate bill and retain the divisor, but the rules were suspended and a conference asked. The usual procedure is to ask unanimous consent. The divisor provision went out in conference.

On March 2, 1907, the Postmaster-General, Mr. Cortelyou, issued the following order:

That when the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes, the whole number of days the mails are weighed shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day.

On June 7, 1907, the Postmaster-General, Mr. Meyer, issued the following order:

That when the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes, the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day.

The Attorney-General was asked to give his opinion on this order, and on September 27, 1907, he did so, affirming the order of June 7, 1907. And the divisor was applied.

Keeping in mind the legislative procedure in this instance, Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to this circumstance: The House itself voted the procedure. In every legislative step taken not a majority, but two-thirds made up of Members of both sides of the Chamber, decided to keep in the bill, against points of order and outside the possibility of amendment or debate, two propositions which were debatable reductions and at the same time to pillory one reduction, that of the divisor, which was virtually self-evident. To do this the House had to depart from ordinary order and to adopt extraordinary order, in fact no order at all, for the insertion of matter into a bill after its final passage is not a legislative procedure.

This was not done by the Committee on Rules. It was not done as an indorsement of any committee's research and reported judgment.

Every day on both the Republican and Democratic sides of this Chamber in legislation the word is bruited about: "Vote with the committee. The committee knows. It has investigated." This is the first thing, by the way, the new Member, with a confusion of subjects pressing upon him, hears in this Chamber. In this case, the majority report of the committee was for four provisions in the reduction of mail pay, three of them incorporated in a single paragraph. But the House did not vote with the committee.

There was no partisan exigency upon the House. The vote was not partisan.

The four propositions were in the bill, placed there in committee. In ordinary procedure they would have gone out on points of order. They would have fallen together and they could have come up in a separate bill for the consideration of the House and not subject to a point of order.

Was the House as a whole opposed to the corrected divisor? I do not believe so. The House was offered the same old legislative half loaf. It was not offered and it could not have had the selection of either half. It was offered the one-half, and it was told to take that or nothing. It took the half loaf because it had to take it.

Why? Was it because of the system of legislative procedure here? Under that system is the vitality of initiative in the individual in his representative capacity growing, or is it diminishing year by year?

The individual has his share of the responsibility in a majority vote, and I am not speaking in a partisan way, but he has little or no voice in determining the question upon which he shall vote, except in purely partisan matters. For there is more latitude to the individual, more right of initiative in the political caucuses of both sides of this Chamber than there is in the House in matters of moment in ordinary legislation.

The very rules by nature force a process of narrowing control. It is not confined to the side of the partisan majority, for I have seen, since my service began in this House, the minority leader remove, by refusing to reappoint, members of his party from a committee because they had opinions differing from that of a majority of the minority on the committee.

Any committee of the House which handles appropriations is supposed to be powerful. These committees have been called "little legislatures." Such a committee investigates and, with the power of initiative, which with the right of prior recognition is nine points in legislation as possession is in law, brings to the whole House a measure which has the protection of all the powerful machinery of the House in privilege, in recognition, and in securing favorable attendance. But the committee can, with narrowing control, lose its own power to its chairman, and the House, weakening in its power of resistance to the temptation of the half loaf, will upon occasion follow a chairman individually rather than the committee.

I believe that this system of legislative procedure can not last; that it has in it the error which will correct it, and that there will come in the train of the correction not disorder, but order.

That it should come is, to my mind, of much more importance than any single item of expenditure. How it will come I do not know, but I believe that its first manifestation will be a public demand for simplification of the rules, for the election of the Committee on Rules by the House, and for a larger membership of the committee, and eventually a demand that the doors of all committee rooms be opened, that all proceedings in committee and all votes in committee be recorded and be made accessible to the membership of the House and to the public. [Applause.]

ORDER OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

Order No. 412. OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 7, 1907.

Ordered, that order 165, dated March 2, 1907, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That when the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes, the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day."

G. v. L. MEYER,
Postmaster-General.

OPINION OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL IN THE MATTER OF COMPENSATION OF RAILROAD COMPANIES FOR CARRYING THE MAILS, ETC.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, September 27, 1907.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your request for an opinion as to the legality of order No. 412 of your Department, issued June 7, 1907, and of order No. 165, for which it was a substitute. I learn from you that these orders are as follows:

Order No. 165, dated March 2, 1907:

"That when the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes, the whole number of days the mails are weighed shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day."

Order No. 412, dated June 7, 1907:

"When the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes, the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day."

The statutes which appear to bear directly on the subject are the following:

Section 4002 of the Revised Statutes (from the act of March 3, 1873, 17 Stat., 558):

"SEC. 4002. The Postmaster-General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation hereafter to be paid for the transportation of mails on railroad routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned.

"First. That the mails shall be conveyed with due frequency and speed and that sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed shall be provided for route agents to accompany and distribute the mails.

"Second. That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of 200 pounds, $50; 500 pounds, $75; 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,500 pounds, $125; 2,000 pounds, $150; 3,500 pounds, $175; 5,000 pounds, $200; and $25 additional for every additional 2,000 pounds, the average weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, at such times, after June 30, 1873, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct."

Post-office appropriation act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat., 341), following an appropriation for inland mail transportation by railroad:

"* * * And out of the appropriation for inland mail transportation the Postmaster-General is authorized hereafter to pay the expenses of taking the weights of mails on railroad routes, as provided by the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1874,' approved March 3, 1873; and he is hereby directed to have the mails weighed as often as now provided by law by the employees of the Post-Office Department and have the weights stated and verified to him by said employees under such instructions as he may consider just to the Post-Office Department and the railroad companies."

Post-office appropriation act of March 3, 1905 (33 Stat., 1088), following an appropriation for inland mail transportation by railroad:

"Provided, That hereafter before making the readjustment of pay for transportation of mails on railroad routes the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than ninety, at such times after June 30, 1905, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct."

The acts of July 12, 1876 (19 Stat., 79), June 17, 1878 (20 Stat., 142), and March 2, 1907 (35 Stat., 1205–1212), make certain changes in the rates of compensation, but none in the method of ascertaining the average daily weight of mail transported.

Were this question res integra, I should not consider it one of much difficulty. United States Revised Statutes 4002 fixes a rate of yearly pay per mile of track used to transport the mails, determined by the "average weight of mails per day" carried the entire length of the route. I see no escape from the conclusion that this means the average weight per day during a year; so that if on a particular route there were thus carried on one day 365,000 pounds and on the remaining 364 days nothing at all, the "average weight of mails per day," on which the annual compensation should be calculated, would be 1,000 pounds. If, therefore, it had been deemed practicable or advisable to weigh all the mails transported by rail every day of the year there could have been, to my mind, no doubt as to how the "average weight per day" would be determined, whether the mails were so carried on 365 days or on 313 or on 156 or on 12 or, as above suggested, on 1 day, their aggregate weight would have been added up and divided in all cases alike, by 365.

It is, however, often impracticable without unreasonable labor to ascertain a strictly accurate average, and in such cases a conventional average is frequently established by law, agreement, or custom which is nearly enough right for all practical purposes and can be ascertained with vastly less trouble. A familiar example of this practice is the calculation of interest on a current bank balance. For this to be absolutely correct the balances due on every day of the year would have to be determined, added up, and divided by the whole number of days, i. e., 365, which, in the case of, say, a savings bank with many thousands of small accounts might involve an expense altogether disproportionate to the amount of the interest. It is therefore customary to ascertain the balances on a comparatively small number of days, often twelve, throughout the year, average these, and assume the result to be the average annual balance for the purpose of calculating interest.

It seems to have been, or to have been thought, unreasonably burdensome to require the mails to be weighed every day of the year, and the Congress, by the acts of March 3, 1873, and March 3, 1905, above noted, prescribed conventional methods of ascertaining the average weight. The methods are thus stated:

Act of March 3, 1873:

"* * * the average weight to be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, at such times, after June 30, 1873, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct."

Act of March 3, 1905:

"* * * the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than ninety, at such times after June 30, 1905, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct."

It will be noted that these two acts say nothing about "divisors," and indeed do not profess to deal with the method of computation at all. How, from the statement of weights, he should obtain the result sought—that is to say, the daily average for a year on which the compensation was to be based—was a matter left to the discretion of the Postmaster-General. The Congress said to him only: "You need not cause the mails to be weighed every day of the year to ascertain the average weight per day during the year. You may, if you so choose" (for, it is to be observed, the law is permissive merely; the Postmaster-General, if he has money enough, may order the mails to be weighed for three hundred and sixty-five days). "You may, if you choose, weigh the mails only thirty" (now ninety "days of each year, and only once in four years; but if you do this, the days selected must be working days and must be successive."

It is important to determine the meaning of the words lastly above italicized. It is said that "working days" has been consistently interpreted by the practice of your Department to mean "week days." I do not think this statement can be sustained, for I am informed by you that prior to the act of 1905 the practice had been to weigh the mails on thirty-five consecutive days, thus including five Sundays. Now, I think, the law is on one point, at all events, perfectly clear: The mails are to be weighed on "working days" and on "working days" only; the use of the word "successive," instead of "consecutive," or some term of similar import, harmonizes exactly with this literal and, to my mind, unavoidable interpretation of the remaining words used. If, therefore, "working days" are to be read "week days," the practice of your Department, in thus weighing the mails on five Sundays, has been altogether illegal. If, however, the meaning of "working days" be "days on which mails are carried," the practice, to this extent, has been legal and in accord with what I believe to be the true intent of the law. As the practice of any of the great Executive Departments must always be assumed, so far as such assumption be possible, to rest upon a consistent and tenable view of the law, it is, I think, fair to say that the practice of the Post-Office Department, as contradistinguished from the language sometimes used by prominent officials in the course of the prolonged discussion of questions connected with this subject-matter, sustains the view that the words "working days" mean "days on which the carrier does work for the Post-Office," and not "week days;" and this I regard as clearly the true interpretation of the law.

It would seem, however, that an error has crept into the practice of your Department, as hereinafter stated, in the method of dealing with the information furnished through weighing the mails for at least thirty, now ninety, working days. As above noted, the obvious purpose of this provision is to relieve the Postmaster-General from the necessity of weighing the mails for every working day of the year. It does not prohibit him from weighing the mails throughout the year; nor does it require that the number of working days on which the mails are weighed shall be the same in the case of every carrier, although in none may they be less than thirty, now ninety, or other than "successive." Moreover, it in no wise changes the purpose of the inquiry, which, as above explained, has always been to ascertain a fair average per day during a year; not, of course, a fair average per day during seven or thirty or thirty-five or ninety or one hundred and five days, or any other fraction of a year. Having obtained from the results of the weighing such information as it can furnish as to the fair average weight for a "working day," it is left to the Postmaster-General to so deal with this information as to determine from it by appropriate calculations what would be a fair daily average for the ends of the law, i. e., as a basis for an annual compensation. It is obvious that from the mere weighing (which is all the law prescribes), standing alone, nothing would be determined as to the average. The Postmaster-General must therefore do something not mentioned in the statute to ascertain this, and although this matter is left to your discretion, and you are, of course, in no wise bound by any views expressed in this opinion regarding it, I think it may conduce to clearness if I here indicate what form of calculation appears to me best adapted to attain the ends of the law. We may suppose three railroads, of which one serves the mails seven, one six, and one three days in each week, and that the aggregate results of the weighing, divided by the number of days on which, in each case, the mails have been weighed, shows in each a daily average per working day of 1,000 pounds. In determining for each the fair average per day during a year, no change is needed in the figures for the first; those for the second should be reduced by one-seventh, and those for the third by four-sevenths; so that the first would be 1,000 pounds, the second 857.14 pounds, the third 428.57 pounds.

I have said that I should consider the question involved in your request one of no great difficulty were it a new one. Such, however, is not the case.

Prior to the issuance of order No. 165 on March 2, 1907, the uniform practice of the Post-Office Department, except for a short period in 1884, as hereinafter stated, in determining the average daily weight of mail transported on railroad routes, appears to have been to have such mail weighed for a period covering not less than thirty successive working days (which term had been alleged to mean thirty successive week days, and therefore made such weighing period cover at least five weeks, or thirty-five days), and in every case, whether the mail was carried and weighed three, six, or seven days of the week, to divide the total weight thus ascertained by the number of working or week days in such period—that is to say, thirty. Thus in the case of a route on which the mail was carried three days of the week the weight was taken on such days for five weeks and the aggregate of the fifteen weighings divided by thirty to obtain the daily average. The same process was followed for thirty or thirty-five weighings, respectively, in the cases of routes on which the mail was carried six and seven days of the week. The average obtained was described as a "working" or "week" day average and not considered a daily average; but with regard to Sunday carrying roads it was evidently neither.

This practice, it appears, grew out of an effort to compensate the Sunday carrying roads for facilitating the transmission of the mails. It was thought that if the weight of mails carried on Sundays had been omitted in the case of such roads they would not only have received no compensation for carrying the same, but would have suffered an actual loss by reason of their diligence, because by delaying the same until Monday it was said that they could have had such mail weighed in on that day.

In a letter from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to C. Jay French, superintendent railway mail service, fifth division, dated March 24, 1876, there are the following instructions:

"The mails are to be weighed for the given number of successive working days (thirty in the weighing to which these instructions particularly relate), and in case mails are carried on any route also on Sundays, returns of the weights of such Sunday mails are to be furnished in the same manner as the others, to be included in consolidating the returns for the period, the object being, as you are aware, to obtain a fair average of the service for the working year. On the other hand, if mails are conveyed less frequently than every working day, the period of the weighing is not to embrace more than the given number of working days, counting both those on which the mails are conveyed and those on which they are not, the object being the same as in the other case."

On September 18, 1884, Postmaster-General W. Q. Gresham issued order No. 44, as follows:

"That hereafter when the weight of mails is taken on railroad routes performing service seven days per week the whole number of days the mails are weighed, whether thirty or thirty-five, shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average weight per day."

Postmaster-General Gresham retired in October, 1884. Postmaster-General Frank Hatton, who succeeded him, submitted the question to the Attorney-General, his letter and the reply thereto being as follows:

OCTOBER 22, 1884.

SIR: The act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stat., p. 558), regulating the pay for carrying the mails on railroad routes, provides * * * "That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of 200 pounds, $50; 500 pounds, $75; 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,500 pounds, $125; 2,000 pounds, $150; 3,500 pounds, $175, etc. * * * ; the average weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty. * * *."

Upon a large number of the railroad routes mails are carried on six days each week—that is, no mails are carried on Sunday. On others they are carried on every day in the year.

It has been the practice since 1875, in arriving at the average weight of mails per day on these two classes of service, to treat the "successive working days" as being composed of the six working or secular days in the week, which is explained by the following illustrations:

Two routes, No. 1 and No. 2, over each of which 313 tons of mail are carried annually:

On route No. 1 mails are carried twice daily, except Sunday, six days per week, and are weighed for thirty successive working days—covering usually a period of thirty-five days. The result is divided by 30 and an average weight of mails per day of 2,000 pounds is obtained.

Transportation per mile of road per annum	miles	1,252
Weight per mile of road per annum	tons	313
Pay per ton per mile of road per annum	cents	37.92
Pay per mile run	do	11.9
Rate of pay allowed per mile per annum		$150

On route No. 2 mails are carried twice daily, seven days per week, and are weighed for thirty successive working days and for the intervening Sundays, the weight on the Sundays being treated as if carried on Mondays, the weighing, as before, covering usually a period of thirty-five days. The result is divided by 30 and an average weight of mails per day of 2,000 pounds is obtained.

Transportation per mile of road per annum	miles	1,460
Weight per mile of road per annum	tons	313
Pay per ton per mile of road per annum	cents	47.92
Pay per mile run	do	10.2
Rate of pay allowed per mile per annum		$150

I have thought it necessary to give the foregoing illustrations in order that the practice of this Department under the law cited may readily appear, and I will thank you to advise me whether that practice is in compliance with or in violation of the statute. If not in conformity with the law, will you please indicate the correct method by which the average weight per day should be obtained and the compensation adjusted thereon.

Very respectfully,

FRANK HATTON,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General, Department of Justice.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, October 31, 1884.

SIR: I have considered your communication of the 22d instant, requesting to know whether the construction placed by the Post-Office Department on section 4002, subordinate section 2, prescribing the mode in which the average of the weight of mails transported on railroad routes shall be ascertained is correct, and am of opinion that that construction is correct, and that a departure from it would defeat the intention of the law and cause no little embarrassment.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

S. F. PHILLIPS,
Acting Attorney-General.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

The above letter from the Acting Attorney-General is taken from Opinions of Attorney-General, Volume VIII, page 71. While it is there stated that it was signed by S. F. Phillips, the original, received at the Post-Office Department, is signed by William A. Maury.

Postmaster-General Gresham's order was revoked January 16, 1885. This order had evidently in view the same purpose as order No. 165.

We have here, then, a case where the practical interpretation placed upon the act of Congress of March 3, 1873, in regard to obtaining the daily average weight of mail upon railroad routes by the Post-Office Department has been, except for a few months, unbroken for thirty-five years, although its correctness was authoritatively challenged. It also appears that while Congress, in 1876 and 1878 and again in 1907, provided for a reduction in the maximum rates established by the act of March 3, 1873, it made no change in the provision as to obtaining the average weight. It further appears that in 1905 Congress reenacted that provision in exactly the same language, except that "ninety" was substituted for "thirty."

Moreover, it should be noted that the post-office appropriation bill (H. R. 25483) reported to the House on February 6, 1907, provided:

"The Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after the 1st day of July, 1907, for the transportation of mails on railroad routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of upward of 5,000 pounds by making the following reductions from the present rates per mile per annum for the transportation of mails on such routes; On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mail per day of more than 5,000 pounds and less than 48,000 pounds, 5 per cent; 48,000 pounds and less than 80,000 pounds, 10 per cent, and $19 additional for every additional 2,000 pounds: Provided, That hereafter the average weight per day be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive days, not less than 105, at such times and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct: Provided further, That hereafter, at the time of the weighing of the mails at the periods required by law, empty mail bags shall not be weighed nor taken as any part of the total weight of the mails in estimating the pay for transportation of said mails."

The accompanying report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and two minority reports discussed the question very fully and showed clearly the intention on the part of the committee, that, in the words of its report—

"In computing the average weight of mail carried per day, the whole number of days such mail may be weighed shall be used as the divisor."

On February 20, 1907, while the House in Committee of the Whole was considering the post-office bill, the following amendment was offered by Mr. MURDOCK to follow the provision "For inland transportation by railroad routes, $44,660,000:"

"Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended in payment for transportation of the mails by railroad routes where the average weight of mails per day has been computed by the use of a divisor less than the whole number of days such mails have been weighed."

A point of order was made against this amendment on the ground that it changed existing law. The Chair sustained the point, observing (41 Cong. Rec., 3471):

"The CHAIRMAN. The existing law has received a construction by the officers charged with the duty of administering it, and that construction the Chair feels bound to follow. The proposed amendment changes existing law as construed by the proper officer, by changing the divisor. This is in the guise of a limitation; but it has been held over and over again here that a limitation is negative in its nature and may not include positive enactment establishing rules for executive officers. It has been held further that while limitation may provide that a part of an appropriation shall not be used except in a certain way, yet the restriction of executive discretion may not go to the extent of an imposition of new duties. And the limitation on the discretion exercised under the law by a bureau of the Government is a change of existing law. The decisions on the question of limitation, the attempt to draw a well-defined distinction between changes of existing law and a proper limitation, are among the most difficult questions that the Chair is ever called upon to decide."

Upon appeal from the decision of the Chair its ruling was sustained. (Id., 3472.)

Later on the same day the provision of the bill above quoted directing the Postmaster-General to readjust the compensation to be paid from and after July 1, 1907, for the transportation of the mails on railroad routes, which included the proviso "That hereafter the average weight per day be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive days," etc. (the word "working" being omitted), was went out upon a point of order (41 Cong. Rec., 3473). Subsequently, on the same day, the rules were suspended, and this provision, without the proviso as to obtaining the average, was inserted and became the law. (Id., 3494.)

The principles of law bearing upon the solution of the matter under consideration in this aspect are settled by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

It has been held that where the meaning of a statute is doubtful or ambiguous the practical construction placed upon it by the Department of the Government charged with its administration, if contemporaneous, uniform, and long continued, although not deemed controlling on the courts, is to be treated with respect and will ordinarily be followed. (Brown v. United States, 113 U. S., 568; United States v. Philbrick, 120 U. S., 52; Robertson v. Downing, 127 U. S., 607; United States v. Alabama R. R. Co., 142 U. S., 615.)

In the last-mentioned case, which involved the question of compensation to railroads for carrying the mails, the court said:

"* * * It is a settled doctrine of this court that, in case of ambiguity, the judicial department will lean in favor of a construction given to a statute by the Department charged with the execution of such statute, and, if such construction be acted upon for a number of years, will look with disfavor upon any sudden change whereby parties who have contracted with the Government upon the faith of such construction may be prejudiced."

But the true scope of this principle is illustrated by a considerable number of cases in which the court has refused to adopt the departmental construction of a statute. In these cases the court has said that such departmental construction is without weight where the statute is clear and explicit and free from ambiguity or doubt. (Swift Co. v. United States, 105 U. S., 691, 695; United States v. Graham, 110 U. S., 219, 221; United States v. Tanner, 147 U. S., 661, 663; United States v. Alger, 152 U. S., 384, 397; Studebaker v. Perry, 184 U. S., 258, 268–269.)

In Swift Co. v. United States, the court says:

"There is no serious question raised as to the proper construction of the internal-revenue acts upon the point, it being virtually admitted that the contention on the part of the appellant upon the provisions of the statutes is correct.

"It is met, however, in the opinion of the Court of Claims, and in argument on behalf of the Government here, that the contrary construction, to pay these commissions in stamps at their face value, has been acted upon by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue from the beginning, has been acquiesced in by purchasers and dealers, and has never been changed by Congress; and as an official practice has thus acquired the force of law, or if not, then, at least, it was a course of dealing, well known to the appellant, and acquiesced in, by which it accepted stamps at their face value in payment of its commissions, which it is not at liberty now to open, question, and reverse.

"The right construction of the internal-revenue acts upon the point of the allowance of commissions to dealers in proprietary articles, purchasing stamps made from their own dies, and for their own use, is too clear to bring the case within the first alternative. The rule which gives determining weight to contemporaneous construction, put upon a statute, by those charged with its execution, applies only in cases of ambiguity and doubt. (Edward's Lessee v. Darby, 12 Wheat., 206; Smythe v. Fiske, 23 Wall., 374; United States v. Moore, 95 U. S., 760; United States v. Pugh, 99 id., 265.)"

In United States v. Alger, the court says:

"If the meaning of that act were doubtful, its practical construction by the Navy Department would be entitled to great weight. But as the meaning of the statute as applied to these cases appears to this court to be perfectly clear, no practice inconsistent with that meaning can have any effect. (Swift Co. v. United States, 105 U. S., 691, 695; United States v. Graham, 110 U. S., 619; United States v. Tanner, 147 U. S., 661.)"

In so far as this question is affected by the practice of the Post-Office Department standing alone, I think it comes fully within the principle laid down in the two cases lastly above cited. The law says the average weight shall be ascertained "by the actual weighing of the mails for * * * successive working days." The practice has been to weigh on Sundays, and yet when the average is to be ascertained Sundays are excluded from the divisor. This practice is not only clearly erroneous, but logically indefensible. If Sundays are not "working days," the law does not permit the mails to be weighed on Sundays; if they are "working days," their exclusion from the divisor renders the result of the computation false on its face. It may be conceded that the question whether "working day" is to be interpreted "week day" in this provision of the statute is not free from doubt, and if the practice of the Post-Office Department were consistent with one construction and inconsistent with the other, there might be room to apply the doctrine of Brown's and Philbrick's cases; but as it is consistent with neither, and can be defended, if at all, only by reading the words in one sense for one purpose and in another sense for another purpose, there is no room for the application of any such doctrine.

The practice seems to have constituted, in fact, a sort of administrative legislation, intended to encourage the carrying of the mails on Sundays, and the most serious difficulty connected with the subject is to determine whether there has not been a legislative sanction of the practice by the Congress in its failure to change the method of computation when it reenacted the statute in 1905, for there can be no question that the practice of the Department in this respect was, or might have been, well known to the Congress, by reason of very full statements concerning it in public documents.

In Dollar Savings Bank v. United States, 19 Wall., 227, the court refused to hold that the Congress, by the reenactment of a statute, had adopted the construction placed upon it by the Department of the Government charged with its administration. The statute under consideration in that case (act of Congress of July 13, 1866, 14 Stat., 138) provided:

"That there shall be levied and collected a tax of 5 per cent on all dividends in scrip or money thereafter declared due, wherever and whenever the same shall be payable, to stockholders, policy holders, or depositors, or parties whatsoever, including nonresidents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, income, or gains of any bank, trust company, savings institution, and of any fire, marine, life, inland insurance company, either stock or mutual, under whatever name or style known or called, in the United States or Territories, whether specially incorporated or existing under general laws, and on all undistributed sums, or sums made or added during the year to their surplus or contingent funds; and said banks, trust companies, savings institutions, and insurance companies shall pay the said tax, and are hereby authorized to deduct and withhold from all payments made on account of any dividends or sums of money that may be due and payable as aforesaid the said tax of 5 per cent: * * * Provided, That the tax upon the dividends of life insurance companies shall not be deemed due until such dividends are payable; nor shall the portion of premiums returned by mutual life insurance companies to their policy holders, nor the annual or semiannual interest allowed or paid to the depositors in savings banks or savings institutions, be considered as dividends."

It was contended that savings institutions were relieved from taxation by the proviso to this section; but the court held otherwise, and in reply to the argument based upon the practical construction placed upon the act, said (pp. 236–237):

"Our attention has been called to the fact that in 1867 and again in 1870 the Commissioners of Internal Revenue construed the proviso as exempting savings institutions from the tax upon all sums added to their surplus or contingent funds, and that the act of Congress of July 14, 1870, which reduced internal taxation, employed substantially the same language respecting savings banks as that contained in the act of 1866. In view of this, the plaintiffs in error argue that Congress required the Commissioner to prescribe what returns savings banks should make; that this made it his duty to put a construction on the law; that he did so, and held that such institutions were not required to return undistributed earnings carried to a surplus fund, and that after this practical construction had been made and acted upon more than three years Congress reenacted the tax, reduced in amount, in the same words. Hence, it is inferred, the construction given by the Commissioner was adopted. It is, doubtless, a rule that when a judicial construction has been given to a statute the reenactment of the statute is generally held to be in effect a legislative adoption of that construction. This, however, can only be when the statute is capable of the construction given to it, and when that construction has become a settled rule of conduct. The rule, we think, is inapplicable to this case. In the first place, the decisions of the Internal Revenue Commissioner can hardly be denominated judicial constructions. That officer was not required by the law to prescribe what returns savings banks were required to make. That was prescribed by the act of Congress itself, and he had no power to dispense with the requisition. There is therefore no presumption that his decisions were brought to the knowledge of Congress when the act of 1870 was passed. And again, the construction he gave is an impossible one, for, as we have seen, it makes the proviso plainly repugnant to the body of the section.

"We are constrained, then, to hold that the act of Congress does impose upon the plaintiffs in error the tax, to recover which the present suit was brought."

This opinion would probably be decisive of the present question were it not for some more recent decisions of the court. In New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission (200 U. S., 361, 399) it was contended that the prohibition of the act to regulate commerce and its amendments against undue preferences and discriminations ought not to be interpreted as applying against a carrier who was a dealer in commodities "because of an administrative construction long since given to the act by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the body primarily charged with its enforcement, and which has become a rule of property affecting vast interests which should not be judicially departed from, especially as such construction, it is asserted, has been impliedly sanctioned by Congress by frequently amending the act without changing it in this particular." The court said on this point (p. 401):

"* * * A construction made by the body charged with the enforcement of a statute, which construction has long obtained in practical execution, and has been impliedly sanctioned by the reenactment of the statute without alteration in the particulars construed, when not plainly erroneous, must be treated as read into the statute. Especially do we think this rule applicable to the case in hand, because of the nature and extent of the authority conferred on the Commission from the beginning concerning the prohibitions of the act as to rebates, favoritism, and discrimination of all kinds, and particularly in view of the repeated declarations of the court that an exertion of power by the Commission concerning such matters was entitled to great weight and was not lightly to be interfered with."

These remarks were, strictly speaking, obiter dicta, for the court said immediately afterwards:

"The concessions thus made, however, are wholly irrelevant to the case before us."

In the case of United States v. Falk & Bro. (204 U. S., 143), however, the court seems to have come very near qualifying the decision in Dollar Savings Bank v. United States, above cited. In that case the Government contended that the practical construction given by the Executive Department to a proviso in the tariff act of 1890 should control the interpretation of a similar proviso in the tariff act of 1897, and the court sustained that view, saying (p. 152):

"This, then, is our view: The Attorney-General having construed the proviso of section 50 of the act of 1890 as not restricted to the matter which immediately preceded it, but as of general application, and this construction having been followed by the executive officers charged with the administration of the law, Congress adopted the construction by the enactment of section 33 of the act of 1897, and intended to make no other change than to require as the basis of duty the weight of the merchandise at the time of entry instead of its weight at the time of its withdrawal from warehouse."

This aspect of the question has caused me some measure of doubt, but, upon careful consideration, I do not think it falls within the principle of the case last cited. The construction supposed to have been placed upon the statute in the practice of the Post-Office Department is not only "plainly erroneous," like the case suggested as an exception by the court in 200 United States, but is "an impossible one," as was that rejected by the court in 19 Wall. There is nothing to show that the construction by the Attorney-General sustained in the Falk case seemed to the court either "plainly erroneous," or "impossible." It must be furthermore remembered that in reenacting the statute in 1905, as in enacting it in 1873, the Congress only fixed a minimum to the number of days on which the Postmaster-General must have the mails weighed; he remained, as he had been previously, entirely at liberty to increase their number in his discretion, and he might therefore, as above noted, have made the weighing period extend through the entire year, or have supplemented the weighing by computations, which would render practically nugatory the construction supposed to be involved in the practice. In other words, in 1905 the Congress may have felt justified in awaiting an administrative remedy for a faulty administrative practice and have only thought seriously of a legislative remedy two years later. The opinion purporting to have been given by Solicitor-General Phillips on October 31, 1884, is not only, as above stated, irregular in form, but so meager and inadequate in its statement and discussion of the questions involved that I can not recognize it as binding upon me in the premises. As to the decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, sustained upon appeal, to the effect that the proposed amendment requiring a divisor "not less than the whole number of days such mails have been weighed," made a change in existing law, I am not aware of any precedent holding such a decision to be binding upon this Department. The decision may be held, moreover, to have been correct without regard to the "construction" alleged by the Chairman to have been placed upon the law by "the proper officer."

It follows from what I have said that I consider the form or method in which the information obtained from weighing the mails in accordance with the act of March 3, 1905, shall be utilized a matter in your discretion, provided your action shall be directed to the ascertainment of what, according to your best judgment, would be an average weight as nearly true as may be practicable per day during a year of the mails carried as the statute lastly aforesaid directs, to be used as a basis for a yearly compensation to the carrier; of course the adequacy of such compensation is for the Congress, not for the Postmaster-General. Each of the two orders first above mentioned constituted therefore, in strictness, a legal exercise of a discretion vested by law in the Postmaster-General. If, however, no further calculation is to be made beyond the addition of ascertained weights and division by the divisor selected, it seems obvious that Order No. 165 may lead to arbitrary and inequitable results. Order No. 412, upon the same assumption, will give, as the average weight per day during a year, the said average weight per day during somewhat more than one-fourth of a year; and there is no reason to suppose its results will be unjust or have any greater inaccuracy than is authorized and contemplated by the act of 1905.

Yours, respectfully, CHARLES J. BONAPARTE,
Attorney-General.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is not in his seat at present, but I understand that he desires to yield one hour to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will be recognized for one hour.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill carries an appropriation of over $220,000,000. It is the largest appropriation that was ever made through the Post-Office Committee in the history of the Republic. It is larger by $8,000,000 than the appropriation of last year. It is nearly $10,000,000 less, however, than the estimates that were made by the Post-Office Department. This bill carries provisions for a number of new offices. It provides salaries for 185 additional assistant postmasters and 2,300 new clerks in first and second class postoffices. It carries an appropriation for 1,500 additional letter carriers, 565 new railway mail clerks, and 1,500 rural carriers. There are other new offices provided in this bill that can not well be enumerated. The total number of additional offices beyond that which is carried in the current law will reach about 7,500.

I do not mention this to criticise the bill. My judgment is that these additional officers are necessary to meet the exigencies of the growing service. There is no Department in this Government that shows such advance in its business as does the Postal Department. It is a constantly growing service. It is a very difficult thing for the Post-Office Committee to ascertain just how much should be expended from time to time, and how much addition should be made to the various objects of expenditure. The committee have been exceedingly cautious to make no expenditures that need not be made. That is shown by the fact that they have appropriated so much less than the amount that is estimated for by the Department itself.

There is one branch of the service in which a decrease is proposed, and that is in the inspection branch. The bill carries the pay for twenty-two less than the number of inspectors that are now in the service—that are provided for in the current law. The inspection service is one of the most important branches of the Government.

It is a service which means much to the American people in determining and enforcing the regulations of the Department. There is no class of officials, however, who are vested with power more dangerous than are the inspectors of the Postal Department. These individuals are permitted from time to time to open the letters of others and see what is in them, and, it may be, to retain them in such way that the individual to whom the letter is mailed shall never have the opportunity of receiving it.

There have been some general investigations in the recent past. You will remember that some four or five years ago there was an investigation of the First Assistant Postmaster-General's bureau. It is a surprising thing, if your attention has never been called to it, that the man who conducted that investigation within a very short time after the investigation was himself outside the postal service. The man who was then chief inspector, in charge of that inspection work, was changed from the inspection service and was given employment of a different kind. It is also true that those who assisted most in that inspection, other than the chief inspector, have recently found themselves in positions less important than those which they held at that time.

There was another investigation with which you are more or less familiar, and especially with which Missourians are conversant. I have reference to the investigation of what is known as the "Lewis publications" in St. Louis. That investigation was conducted by the then Third Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Madden. But Mr. Madden is now out of the postal service, and it is intimated, and may be true, that the post-office inspectors who were responsible for that investigation and conducted it, will soon find themselves occupying places less important than those which they occupy to-day. What does this signify? Is it true that this inspection department is to find itself shorn of power when it undertakes to discharge fearlessly the duty devolving upon it? Is it true that the powers that be to-day are concerned in having an inspection force that will not inspect, investigators who will not investigate? Have these changes been accidental, or are they the result of a determination somewhere to humiliate those who were responsible for the punishment of wrongdoing and have exposed those who have betrayed official trusts?

What does it all mean? Is there any lesson to be gathered from it?

I wish to call attention also to another feature of postal matters, namely, postmasters' salaries. Postmasters are divided into four classes, as perhaps you know, first, second, third, and fourth. A fourth-class postmaster is in the lowest class. He receives no fixed salary. His compensation is made up from commissions on the receipts of the office. When these receipts amount to $1,900 the office becomes third class. If the receipts of the office are $1,900, then there will be a third-class postmaster appointed by the President who will receive a salary of $1,000. In addition to that he may receive clerk hire to the extent of $200, rent of building not to exceed $480, and for fuel and light a sum not to exceed $80, but if it should happen that the receipts of the office were only $1,875, then all that the postmaster can receive is less than $1,000, and he must rent his own room, furnish his light and fuel, and employ his own clerk. You can see that this is manifestly wrong. Either the third-class postmaster is receiving too great a compensation or the fourth-class postmaster is not receiving enough. [Applause.]

This can easily be remedied. I make this suggestion for your consideration, that up to the sum of $300 all the receipts shall be turned over to the fourth-class postmaster. Between the $300 and $1,900 that the postmaster shall receive 60 per cent of the receipts. You will notice then that if the receipts were $1,900 the postmaster would receive the first $300 and 60 per cent of the next $1,600, which would be $960, making his compensation $1,260 instead of $1,000 under the existing law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now would you have that applied to third-class postmasters, too?

Mr. LLOYD. A third-class postmaster receives a salary of at least $1,000. He may receive clerk hire to the extent of $200; he does receive rent of building, and an allowance for fuel and light, but the proposition I am suggesting would place the $1,260 in the hands of the fourth-class postmaster; but, out of that $1,260 it would be necessary for him to rent a building and furnish his own fuel, light, and clerical assistance.

Now, there is another manifest error in compensation of postmasters, and that is between the third and second classes. If the receipts of an office are $8,000, it becomes a second-class office. Between $1,900 and $8,000 in receipts constitute third-class offices. The compensation varies according to the amount of receipts. Now, if the postal receipts are $8,000, then the least sum that would be paid to a postmaster would be a salary of $2,000, which goes to him absolutely. In addition to that, clerk hire, an assistant superintendent, and other employees, whose full compensation amounts to at least $1,300, making the least expense $3,300. If it did not quite reach the $8,000, the postmaster would receive a salary of $1,900, and under existing law could only receive $500 for clerk hire. The greatest possible amount that he could receive if the receipts of the office were $7,999 would be $2,400 for himself and all of his clerks. The result of it is that the third-class postmaster must necessarily pay out of his salary a large amount to meet the expenses of clerk hire. There ought to be a graduation. One of two things is true: Either the second-class postmaster is receiving too much compenation or the third-class postmaster does not receive enough. This may be remedied by providing some such system as this: Where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000, that his clerk hire may be $200.

$1,200, clerk hire	400
$1,300, clerk hire	500
$1,400, clerk hire	600
$1,500, clerk hire	700
$1,600, clerk hire	800
$1,700, clerk hire	900
$1,800, clerk hire	1,000

Where his salary is $1,900, clerk hire may be $1,100, making in the aggregate $3,000. The difference between that which he would receive and that which the second-class postmaster would secure being $300. Such a graduation from the fourth-class postmaster through the grades in third class to the second-class postmaster would give all of them reasonable compensation.

Another question that ought to be of interest, because it affects all of our localities, unless it be a city district, is the question of mail delivery. At the present time, as you are aware, mails are delivered in the cities. They are also delivered in the rural districts. In the towns of considerable size there is no city mail delivery unless there is a population of 10,000 people or postal receipts of $10,000.

I think this can be remedied. I do not understand why we should give rural service to the farmer, deliver the mail to the residents of the cities, and not give it to the larger towns. If it be right that we provide carriers in the country as well as in the city, it is certain that with equal propriety and with equal justice there should be carriers in the larger towns of less than 10,000 inhabitants and less than $10,000 postal receipts. To meet this contingency I have introduced a bill which I think in part will remedy it; a bill to this effect: Providing that in all offices of first, second and third classes there may be deliveries by carrier, and that in the fourth-class offices the rural carrier may be permitted to deliver to the residents of a town at a box the same as he would to an individual in the country. In other words, in a town of the fourth class, where a citizen of the town is willing to receive his mail at a box, he can do so, just the same as he could if he were to live outside of the corporate limits of the town on a rural route. This would carry the mail to all the people of the country.

If you have not looked into the cost of it, you might be alarmed because of its probable excess. We expend now $26,000,000 for the letter-carrier service in the cities; $35,000,000 for the rural-carrier service in the country, a total of $61,000,000. For $6,000,000 you can provide service that will reach all the third-class post-offices, and provide through the rural-carrier service for the small towns as well. Why not add this additional sum and provide by law for carrying the mail to all the people of the country rather than to a portion of them?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Is it not true where greater facilities are furnished, that it also brings compensation in increased receipts?

Mr. LLOYD. It is always true. You have heard in the speech of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], who has just preceded me, and also from the chairman of the committee [Mr. OVERSTREET] on yesterday, a statement in reference to the reductions that have resulted by reason of the change of law made at the last session with reference to railway mail pay.

It is not my purpose at this time to discuss the question of railway mail pay, but I do want to call attention to one feature of it. The gentleman from Kansas gave an interesting recital with reference to the question of weighing the mail, and I wish to address myself to one phase of it. Under the existing law, and the law which has been on the statute books for a number of years, it is undertaken to ascertain the average daily weight of mail, and that becomes the basis of compensation for carrying the mail by railway. The law has not been changed since 1873 as to the method of weighing. The law to-day is just what it was twelve months ago; but there is a remarkable difference in the amount that the railway companies are receiving for carrying the mail. The law, understand me, has not changed. Congress refused to change it. But in March last, one of the last acts of Mr. Cortelyou before he went out of office as Postmaster-General, was to make an order which had the effect of law, that the divisor should be changed. That order, made in March, was changed in June by the present Postmaster-General. So that there has been three different constructions of the law within one year, and yet during that time no law has been changed by Congress. [Applause.]

I am leading up to what I regard as an exceedingly serious question. If the present ruling of the Postmaster-General is correct, if order 412 is a correct interpretation of the law, then this Government, the people of this Republic, have been defrauded of seventy millions of dollars since 1880. I repeat, if the ruling of the Postmaster-General is correct, then this Government has paid into the hands of the railroad companies seventy millions of dollars that belong to the people. Now, why do I say that? All agree that the change in divisor cuts down the railway mail pay 9.65 per cent. For the purpose of computation call it 10 per cent. The railway mail pay in 1880 was, in round numbers, $10,000,000. In 1907 the railway mail pay was $44,660,000. Adding these together makes $54,660,000. Divide that by two and you have the average amount, and it is pretty nearly correct, $27,300,000, the amount that has been paid annually to the railway companies for carrying the mail. Now, following the latest interpretation of the law, 10 per cent of the $27,000,000 belongs to the people, and in every year during that time there has been paid to the railroad companies $2,700,000 which belongs to the people—the Government itself.

Another remarkable thing in that connection. The Postmaster-General having found out, apparently, that the law was not properly interpreted, that the railroad companies had been receiving 10 per cent too much, this last order was made in June; but it was only made to apply to one of the four weighing sections of the United States.

Three of these weighing sections are not now under the provisions of that order. The Postmaster-General has placed himself in the anomalous position of admitting that the divisor was wrong, and is paying out of the Treasury in the current year over $3,000,000 in violation of the law as he construes it himself. Is it not a serious proposition? There is no way around it. If the Postmaster-General's order is right, then this money belongs to the people.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Would it not be very easy for them to find out what the correct divisor would be and the correct amount by dividing by 105 instead of by 90 without waiting until another weighing period?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They know whether the mail was weighed ninety days or one hundred and five consecutive days?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; and they can make the correct computation. They can easily obtain the amount that ought to be paid and the fact that they do not do it is a positive admission that some of the money they are paying to the railroad companies ought not to be paid, and they are not trying to remedy it.

Mr. FLOYD. If I understand you, this fixing of 7 as the divisor instead of 6 applies to only one of the weighing divisions?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes; to only one of the weighing divisions.

Mr. FLOYD. On what theory do they make it apply to one and not to all?

Mr. LLOYD. On this theory, I suppose that the section to which they made it apply was the one which was weighed last year, after the new order, and it became the basis of weight for the current year; and they propose that in the other sections it shall be made to apply as the weighings are made.

Mr. HARDY. They are only weighed once every four years?

Mr. LLOYD. Once every four years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When they weigh in one section every four years, do they enter into a four-year contract with the railroad at that time?

Mr. LLOYD. That is by operation of the law. It is not necessarily a specific written contract, but it becomes a contract under the law.

Mr. HARDY. As I understand it, the contract does not include the divisor feature, but that is simply a custom?

Mr. LLOYD. Oh, certainly. The divisor proposition has been brought about by the Department. The law is the same, as I said at the outset. The law has not been changed.

Now, I want to call your attention to another situation in this connection. This admission on the part of the Post-Office Department that there has been a wrong done during these thirty-five years has not been corrected by any attempt at legal proceedings, so far as I have knowledge. Why is it that they have not instituted suits against the railroad companies to recover the money which they paid to them that ought not to have been paid? Not a single suit has been started, and none suggested, so far as I know, anywhere within the United States. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department to the extraordinary condition that finds itself there, and beg him to investigate that Department and ascertain whether there is anything wrong in it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I refer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER], who is chairman of that committee.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. WANGER. Do you take the position that there could be a recovery by the United States against the railroads?

Mr. LLOYD. I am not taking any position about it. I simply said that there had been no attempt to recover.

Mr. WANGER. Do you assert that there is a legal right of recovery?

Mr. LLOYD. I simply suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department that it would be well to inquire into the facts with reference to that particular matter.

Mr. WANGER. I wish to assure the gentleman that both will be inquired into and very carefully considered.

Mr. LLOYD. I believe it.

Mr. WANGER. And I would be very glad to have any suggestions from the gentleman or from any other Member of the House.

Mr. LLOYD. I have the utmost confidence in the gentleman from Pennsylvania and believe he will do what he says he will do. Now, it is my purpose to call attention to some other conditions affecting the postal service.

In recent years there has been much said about second-class mail matter and the compensation for carrying it. The recent Third Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Madden, shortly before he went out of office, made this statement:

> This statute in no equivocal terms prohibits the admission of publications to the second class which are primarily designed for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates. The possibilities of construction in that clause are very great.
> Without intending to cause alarm to publishers, I may say that a strict and honest construction and enforcement of that prohibition would force out of the second class from 60 to 70 per cent of all our newspapers and from 70 to 80 per cent of all our magazines.
> I venture the assertion that under no reasonable construction of what constitutes an actual subscriber would it be found, if we should make an investigation to-day, that more than one-half, perhaps not one-third, of all the copies of all the publications now carried free under this provision are lawfully entitled to the privilege.

Think of the statement! If the law with reference to second-class matter were enforced, 60 per cent of the newspapers would be excluded from the pound rate, and from 70 to 80 per cent of the magazines would be excluded from that rate.

The present Third Assistant Postmaster-General realizing the force of this strong statement undertakes to overcome its effect, and makes this statement:

> No utterances of a postal official ever gave more genuine and widespread alarm to innocent and unsuspecting publishers than the words just quoted.

Why not? Of course it would alarm them. Would it not alarm you if you believed the law was to be enforced, and by enforcing it that 60 or 70 per cent of the local newspapers in the district which you have the honor to represent would be excluded from the second-class mail? It is a serious proposition. This officer, faithful as you know he was, made the statement that an honest enforcement of the law would exclude these from the mail.

But the present officer goes further. He says:

> There is to be no wholesale onslaught on 70 to 80 per cent of our publishers, and yet there is to be a fairly honest and rigid enforcement of the law.

What is it to be? Not an honest one, but a fairly honest one. Not a rigid enforcement, but a fairly rigid enforcement. Now, can any of you tell me how far they are going to enforce the law? They are not going to be honest, but will be fairly honest; they are not going to enforce the law rigidly, but will enforce it fairly rigidly. Now, this same officer further said:

> The great majority of newspapers and periodical publishers are high-minded gentlemen, who would not knowingly transgress the law.

How many of that 60 per cent, that 70 per cent, are honest? The Assistant Postmaster-General says a great majority. How many of them are dishonest? I imagine that if there is any Member here representing a country constituency who will go back and intimate that any of the publishers in his district are dishonest he will have trouble on his hands. [Laughter.]

Now, what is the danger? Where does the trouble come in on second-class mail? They claim that it is under this provision of the law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman, before he leaves that point, if that fairly honest enforcement he is talking about would not open up all sorts of opportunity for playing favor in the business?

Mr. LLOYD. It might. I would not say it would. There is one thing that should be done, and that is to honestly enforce the law without reference to the word "fairly." If the law is wrong, Congress can change it.

In this connection I want to say that I am exceedingly weary of having this Government run by executive order. [Applause.] You go down to the Post-Office Department and you will find piled up, sometimes several inches high, orders that have recently been issued which have the effect of law. The truth about it is that the post-office rules and regulations compose nearly the whole of post-office law. Now, I do not want to say that the post-office officials are the only people to blame in this connection, or that they are censurable at all. The law should be so plain that it does not need executive construction, and Congress should make the laws and not make it incumbent upon the head of a Department to do so.

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. I would like to inquire if the committee is doing anything to remedy this trouble, to make the law more certain, to make it more plain, so plain as not to be susceptible of this loose construction, or has the Post-Office Department suggested any amendment to the law which would remedy this difficulty?

Mr. LLOYD. The Post-Office Department has made some suggestions, and consideration has been given it by the committee, but not as much as it should, in my judgment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Let me ask the gentleman if the Penrose bill in the Senate has not that very intention?

Mr. LLOYD. It has the effect, as I understand it, of leaving to the Postmaster-General the sole determination as to whether the publication is entitled to the second-class mail or not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is exactly what I wanted to bring out.

Mr. LLOYD. If that is the purpose of the Penrose amendment, it ought to be defeated. [Applause.] We have too much bureaucracy now, we need more law and less Department rule. [Applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. And more obedience to the law that we have.

Mr. LLOYD. Now, the present Third Assistant Postmaster-General is a most excellent gentleman in my judgment. I do not wish to reflect upon his honesty, integrity, or ability. I have been impressed with him as I have been with but few of the Post-Office officials, but many of the Third Assistant Postmaster-Generals when they get into office undertake the first thing to make some rule with reference to the second-class mail matter. I am not in sympathy with the fight which is made on the second-class mail.

I want to call the attention of the committee to some things that have happened recently under the present Third Assistant Postmaster-General. It has been a rule of the Department from time immemorial—perhaps I ought not to state it in that way, but for a number of years—that 100 per cent of the list of subscribers could be sent out in sample copies. This matter was brought to the attention of the court. The supreme court of the District of Columbia passed upon this question and decided that that was a reasonable regulation of the Department; that to say that more than 100 per cent of a publication could be carried as sample copies, and carried free, would in effect be to say that the newspaper was more concerned in free circulation than it was in actual paid subscriptions. Within the last two months a new order has been made, made at the Post-Office Department, that only 10 per cent of the actual list of subscribers can be used in sample copies, changing this rule which has lasted for all these years from 100 per cent to 10 per cent.

Now, the objection to that, in my judgment, is not so much in the order itself as in the spirit manifested—the spirit of autocracy, one-man rule that asserts itself. It may be that the average newspaper of the country—it is true that the average newspaper does not carry 10 per cent of sample copies. In fact, an investigation has shown that little less than 4 per cent of the publications of the country sent through the mails are sample copies, showing another fact that all this talk that you have heard for all these years about the abuse of the mails with reference to the sample-copy privilege is not so great an abuse as many believe. One would suppose, to hear what is said about sample copies, that nearly all of the mail was sample-copy mail, and yet a careful investigation has shown that less than 4 per cent of it is of that class.

Mr. WANGER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes.

Mr. WANGER. Is it not quite a severe reflection upon Congress that the number of sample copies which may be sent out is not defined by law, so that there is no chance for any executive officer to exercise any control except to enforce the law.

Mr. LLOYD. I said a moment ago, as the gentleman will remember, that I thought Congress ought to assume some of this responsibility.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that we fought that thing out here twice on what was known as the "Loud bill." I helped kill the first Loud bill, and when the second one came I told him that if he would put four amendments to it I would help him to pass it, and we all agreed that the law should be 100 per cent. Nevertheless the bill was defeated. So Congress twice has refused absolutely to fix any limit about it. The chairman of the committee was here at that time, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET].

I would like to ask my friend one question about this sample-copy business and whether he ever investigated this feature of it, and that is whether or not the bulk of sample copies sent out are not confined to a small number, comparatively, of advertising magazines, and that the country press proper sends out comparatively few sample copies?

Mr. LLOYD. I think that is true. I said a moment ago, as far as I was concerned I did not seriously object to the 10 per cent proposition.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the 10 per cent proposition is right.

Mr. LLOYD. I think if I had an opportunity to vote upon that as a proposition in the House, I would vote for the 10 per cent. I am not reflecting upon the rule so much as the power that is asserted behind the rule. Here for years 100 per cent of the list of subscribers has been recognized as the proper amount, and all at once there is a reduction from 100 per cent to 10.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WANGER. Ought not the sample-copy privilege to be much more liberal to newly established publications than to the older ones? Is it not a fact that in starting a newspaper sample copies are one of the means of attracting notice to such a publication?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WANGER. But in the case of the older publication sample copies are largely distributed at the instance of advertisers and as a medium of securing cheaper advertising?

Mr. LLOYD. In answer to that I wish to call attention to the fact that the rule that has recently been promulgated in the Department provides what may be a good system in that regard. It provides for a cumulative 10 per cent. That is, if a newspaper this week did not send out any sample copies, or did not send out any for six months, it could send out all of it in the last six months. It might send all of the sample copies in a single day, as I understand the rule, and is entitled to 10 per cent accumulation during that period.

Mr. WANGER. But it relates to the old established publication just the same as to any other.

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir; there is no difference. The point the gentleman raises is not changed in the rule, excepting that this cumulative privilege would be of more benefit to a paper just starting, because in the first six months or first three months or first month they could, if they chose, use 100 per cent in sending out sample copies.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think in the gentleman's criticism of the power behind the rule to which he made reference it is a further explanation to say that the courts have decided that that power rests legally with the Department in determining the number of sample copies. That was one of the test cases, so that the Third Assistant has not violated any law in establishing that rule.

Mr. LLOYD. My understanding of the decision of the court I called attention to a while ago was that the court held that 100 per cent was a reasonable amount.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But in so holding the court has held the right to fix under the rule a certain number of sample copies——

Mr. LLOYD. The court has repeatedly held that in matters that did not conflict with the law the Department has a right to make a regulation, and that regulation has the effect of law, and not only that, but there is very little chance of appeal from it.

Mr. WANGER. Did not the court in the opinion state that the Department had been very liberal in the 100 per cent?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WANGER. Intimating that it was larger than what might be properly fixed?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If it is true the court held that 100 per cent was not an unfair or an unreasonable number of sample copies, then how did it get in the head of the Department here to cut that down to 10 per cent?

Mr. LLOYD. Simply because they felt they had the power to do it, I take it, and they thought it best for the country that it should be done.

Mr. WANGER. If my other friend from Missouri will permit, the court suggested that it was no error as against the publisher to limit it to 100 per cent, was very liberal toward him, suggesting, however, that the Department would have been entirely within its authority if it had fixed a less percentage, as I remember the decision.

Mr. LLOYD. My recollection is no such suggestion was made, but such an inference might be drawn.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask my friend from Missouri one question. Has this Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads turned its attention to this recent order of the Post-Office Department declaring that a fellow who has not paid his subscription is not a bona fide subscriber?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir; the Post-Office Committee has not taken that in charge at all. I intended to call attention to that. That is an order recently made. The effect of that order is to provide that no newspaper shall do a credit business. Now, the order has a good effect, looking at it from the standpoint of business, and I believe it would be fortunate for this country if all subscriptions were paid in advance.

I believe it would be well for the country if all business was done on a cash basis as nearly as possible, but I doubt whether it is wise to assume authority in a Department to pass a law which says to the newspaper man you can not credit your subscriber, which is the effect of the rule, unless you pay 1 cent on every copy of the paper that you send to a subscriber after one year has elapsed from the date to which he has paid his subscription.

Now the effect of it, as I said a minute ago, from a business standpoint, as I see it, is good; but there are numbers of newspapers that do a credit business. Are you going to shut them out from the pound rate because of it? It may be that everybody would do better on a cash system; but are you going to say to the newspaper man that you must do a cash business, and a cash business only, or suffer at the hands of the Government? Is that the effect of the course that should be pursued?

I want to say in this connection, because, at the instance of a number of persons who are not satisfied with this rule, I have introduced a bill which would abrogate the rule, that I shall not press that bill unless it appears that injury has resulted to the newspapers of the country by reason of the rule, notwithstanding I do not like the power it assumes in trying to govern the newspaper business.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. LLOYD. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is the gentleman at all familiar with the spirit in which that rule has been received by newspaper men generally?

Mr. LLOYD. I have received, as the chairman has, a publication issued at the instance of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, calling attention to the fact that the rule is very popular, and he has given excerpts of various papers calling attention to the fact that they indorse it, and calls attention to the fact that some of the newspaper associations of the country have also indorsed it; but he has not given, so far as I know, a copy of a single letter of an individual that was not satisfied with the rule.

Mr. SMITH of California. Do I understand you to say that the editors and publishers generally of the country are not well pleased with the ruling?

Mr. LLOYD. No, sir; I said that this publication was to the effect that they were satisfied.

Mr. SMITH of California. I want to tell you personally, as the owner and publisher of a country newspaper, that it is the best thing that has ever been done for the newspapers of this country, because it undertakes to put our business on a nearer cash basis.

Mr. LLOYD. But will the gentleman claim that it is right for the Post-Office Department to assume to pass a law which dictates to the newspaper fraternity what they shall do when there are newspaper editors who do not wish to put themselves on a strictly cash basis?

Mr. SMITH of California. I will say that I am in accord with the chairman, that it seems to me that the Postmaster-General may properly protect the Government against the practice of unlimited deadheading in newspaper business. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. LLOYD. That ought to be done, but a purely cash basis is not necessary to that end. Nearly all newspaper men are honorable and law-abiding.

Mr. SMITH of California. I assume that he undertakes to do it from that standpoint and not for their special benefit.

Mr. LLOYD. I have consulted with the Third Assistant Postmaster-General on this point since I introduced that bill, and he assures me that it is not the intention to affect the ordinary newspaper of the country; that any newspaper which shows a disposition to keep up a legitimate list of subscribers will not be interfered with. If that is carried out, I have nothing to say against the rule, except that I think Congress ought to pass the laws and not the Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under what general law does the Postmaster-General presume to have authority to make this regulation. I understand the Postmaster-General has authority to exclude obscene matter and various things from the mails; but under what general authority of law has he the right to say that a man engaged in any business, a newspaper business, shall not be entitled to the benefit of the postal system of the United States unless he engages in it upon a system approved of by the Postmaster-General?

Mr. LLOYD. By this provision of law. The law provides that "all publications of the second class which are designed primarily for advertising purposes or for free circulation or circulation at nominal rates shall be excluded from second-class rates." Now, his interpretation of free circulation and of legitimate lists of subscribers is that the subscriber is not legitimate unless that subscriber has paid for the paper. I think that is his assumption.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the point. The same principle would apply to the man doing a general supply business in my town, which is nearly all done on a year's credit. He would not be engaged in legitimate business.

Mr. LLOYD. I take it to be on the same principle.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi it is not a question whether it is legitimate or an illegitimate business; it is a question of rates. There is no effort to exclude any newspapers. The effort is to determine whether or not they are entitled to a certain rate or another rate. The gentleman from Missouri explained that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand it, the Post-Office Department, in construing the law which gives a certain rate, calls it legitimate for that purpose——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Because he pays a penny a pound weight when sent to parties who are legitimate subscribers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. Now, in construing that law, which grants this right to a legitimate newspaper business, the Postmaster-General arbitrarily rules that the sort of newspaper which credits subscribers is not legitimate.

Mr. WANGER. Is not the Postmaster-General bound to determine what is a legitimate subscriber and what is not by reason of the duty that is imposed upon him by the law?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and in determining that he determines that a newspaper editor who chooses to credit his subscriber is guilty of doing an illegitimate business and excludes him from the mails. Now, it seems to me that is one of the many recent illustrations of executive usurpation.

Mr. WANGER. Suppose that the Postmaster-General makes an error in construing that law. Is not there ample remedy in the courts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; there is not. There is no remedy in the courts against a ruling of that Department. In executing fraud orders, for example, there is no appeal. The Post-Office Department may act as arbitrarily as it pleases, and when it is through with a case there is not a court in the United States to which an appeal can be taken. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] attempted to secure the enactment of a law that would give the right of appeal, and I understand it passed this House, but never was made a law.

Mr. WANGER. In that particular case the discretion was lodged in the Postmaster-General to make that particular kind of fraud order, but here these people are granted a certain mailing privilege, a certain special rate, under conditions which are defined and which the court can ascertain just as well as the Postmaster-General.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will excuse me a moment longer, likewise in a fraud-order case; there was a general law saying that they could exclude from the mails obscene matter, frauds, and various other things, lotteries, etc. The discretion to determine what was a lottery, what was obscene, what was a fraud was of course lodged in the Postmaster-General, and the courts have ruled that that discretion was not reviewable in the courts.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg to challenge that statement of the gentleman from Mississippi so far as that section is concerned, because the Supreme Court has laid down the ruling positively that autocratic power is not lodged in the Post-Office Department, but that it is subject to review by the courts, and it has been reviewed by the courts, and the action of the Post-Office Department has been superseded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In a fraud-order case?

Mr. STAFFORD. In a fraud-order case. The Supreme Court has held that there must be facts adduced before the Department could justify it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not seen that decision, but I do know we had before this House the Crumpacker bill for the purpose of giving the right of appeal, and that the bill passed this House, but did not become a law, and in the course of his argument in that case the gentleman from Indiana asserted the necessity of the law and stated that there was no appeal from these executive orders. Now, if there has been a decision to the contrary since then, I should like to see it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not like to break in at this time, but I can cite the gentleman to the decision at any time.

Mr. LLOYD. Here is a case in 104 United States, page 19, in which the court says:

When Congress has committed to the head of a Department certain duties requiring the exercise of judgment and discretion, his action thereon, whether it involves question of law or fact, will not be reviewed by the court unless he has exceeded his authority or this court should be of the opinion that his action was clearly wrong.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that the case of the Chinaman?

Mr. LLOYD. I am not sure about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the case of a Chinaman who had been a resident of the United States and had gone back to China and had come back here, the Immigration Department, or Bureau, or whatever it is, ruled that he was not entitled to come back, deported him, and substantially banished him. That comes only through the courts, and the courts rule that they can not interfere with that, although it was offered to show that the man was a resident of the United States, had gone away, and was merely coming back. That authority I will later produce.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. LLOYD. I will read:

Where the decision of questions of fact is submitted to the judgment and discretion of the head of a Department, his judgment thereon is conclusive.

Now, a little further on in this pamphlet is what the Third Assistant Postmaster-General says himself:

If, as is clear from the decisions cited and numerous others of like effect, the determination whether a publication has a legitimate list of subscribers, whether it has a free circulation and nominal rates, rests within the sound discretion of the Postmaster-General, it follows by necessity that he is authorized to establish general rules by which he and his subordinates will be guided in reaching such determination.

Mr. YOUNG. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there.

Mr. LLOYD. Very well.

Mr. YOUNG. Is it not a fact that under the law as it now exists the facts upon which this bureau officer acts may be submitted to him in a private report of an inspector, or in a private letter which the party accused has no opportunity to see, and which the public is not allowed to see?

Mr. LLOYD. That is so, and it is a very reprehensible practice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the House wants to be pleasantly and profitably enlightened on this subject, if Members will get the book recently written by Franklin Pierce and published, entitled "Federal Usurpation," and turn to the chapter entitled "Administrative usurpation," they will find a full list of cases of this sort and the rulings of the courts upon them. And they will also see that the statement I made is correct, and that the addendum made to it by my friend is also correct.

Mr. LLOYD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I stated a moment ago, before we got into this colloquy, that I was not in sympathy with the fight that has been made against second-class mail, in so far as it reaches the legitimate press of the country. There is hardly an instance where there is an attempt to regulate what they call abuses that it does not affect in some way the legitimate publications of the country. I wish to call attention also to the fact that the Third Assistant Postmaster-General himself concurs in that view of the situation. He says:

For myself I have little sympathy with the allegation that the transportation of second-class mail matter comprises 67 per cent of the total weight of mail transportation while producing but 4 per cent of the postal revenues, and that it is therefore necessary to slaughter. This statement of relative cost may be true, viewed from a narrow standpoint and excluding from consideration the first-class matter which second-class matter originates.

Now, I have about concluded all I am disposed to say at this time with reference to these questions. This Department is one of the greatest Departments of the Government; it has a variety of duties to perform. It is that branch of the public service which reaches the people of every locality. It has been an unfortunate fact that the head of that Department and the various assistants of it have from time to time been changed so frequently. It will be noticed that to-day the Postmaster-General and three of the assistants have been placed in their positions within twelve months. Now, the Commission appointed by this Congress at the last session to investigate the Department and to make recommendations with reference to its improvement have suggested that there ought to be a director of posts. That director of posts is to occupy something of a permanent position; he is to have under him assistant directors who are not subject to the whims and dictations of the Executive Officer of the country.

Some such system ought to be adopted because it is absurd to think of a man being placed at the head of one of these great Departments, undertaking to administer it, when he himself is not familiar with the duties of the position assigned him. Take, for example, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, with whom you are all acquainted, who is one of the best men that has sat in this House in recent times, an honest, conscientious, faithful public servant, and he has accomplished more in obtaining information in the short time that he has been there than any man connected with the postal service, so far as I have any knowledge. But can he perform the duties of that great position as he ought to perform them with the knowledge that he now has? You need in this service men who well understand the business, who know all the intricacies of it, and who are prepared to tell the public what is necessary in the way of legislation. Can you have much respect for the opinion of a Postmaster-General who has had no experience in the Post-Office Department nor any legislative experience.

Placed at the head of a department, he is expected to give information as to the legislation necessary to improve that great department. My judgment is that we ought to have a system such as has been suggested, have a director of posts who is not dependent on the President of the United States, but who will be expected to acquaint himself with all the departments and fully advise himself as to the duties that devolve upon the various officers in the different bureaus of this branch of service. When this is done and the assistants under him are prepared to perform the duties assigned to them in their respective bureaus, Congress then will be in a position to legislate, and with some degree of certainty as to whether the legislation is what it ought to be or not. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLCOTT].

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to have read at the Clerk's desk and printed in the RECORD an answer to some of the criticisms that have been made of the Navy of the United States, which answer I received to-day from a constituent.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Cerk will read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

A REPLY TO THE CRITICISM OF OUR NAVY.

Come, all ye men-o'-warsmen, and listen to my lay;
'Tis of a New York artist who comes from cold Norway.
He wrote about our Navy, the ships both great and small
Did not escape the censure of Henry Reuterdahl.

In reference to construction of all our ships afloat;
He pictures their destruction in the article he wrote.
He's not in fear of our defeat, the chances are so small
That he took passage in our fleet, bold Henry Reuterdahl.

He never thought that Congress would take his case in hand;
To contradict his statements two admirals took the stand.
To leave him on an island, where deadly serpents crawl,
Would be the proper medicine for Mr. Reuterdahl.

Despite all Reuterdahl has said, our minds are now at ease,
For we've as fine a Navy as floats upon the seas;
We're proud of all commanders, our gunners' aim is true;
We glory in our country and the Red, White, and Blue.

TROOPER.

FEBRUARY 26, 1908.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MANN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 4376. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 5255. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 5110. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 3923. An act to fix the limitation applicable in certain cases:

H. R. 15247. An act to authorize the Idaho and Northwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Spokane River near the city of Coeur d'Alene, Idaho; and

H. R. 6195. An act to authorize A. J. Smith and his associates to erect a dam across the Choctawhatchee River in Dale County, Ala.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Chairman, the enlargement of the delivery of packages of merchandise by mail, usually called "the parcels post," was recently brought prominently before the people of this country by the public utterances of the honorable Postmaster-General. In addition to a number of interviews given out to the press, magazine articles contributed by him, and public speeches delivered, he brought this subject forward officially in his annual report. In the latter he said:

> I recommend the establishment of a special parcels-post system on rural-delivery routes for packages originating on a rural route or at the distributing post-office for delivery by rural carriers to patrons thereof at a rate of 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound or fractional part of an additional pound up to 11 pounds; for 2 ounces or less, 1 cent; over 2 ounces and up to 4 ounces, 2 cents; over 4 and up to 8 ounces, 3 cents; over 8 and up to 12 ounces, 4 cents; over 12 ounces and up to 1 pound, 5 cents.

The President gave a qualified indorsement of this plan in his annual message, saying:

> I further commend to the Congress the consideration of the Postmaster-General's recommendation for an extension of the parcels post, especially on the rural routes. There are now 38,215 rural routes, serving nearly 15,000,000 people who do not have the advantages of the inhabitants of cities in obtaining their supplies. These recommendations have been drawn up to benefit the farmer and the country storekeeper; otherwise, I should not favor them, for I believe it is a good policy for our Government to do everything possible to aid the small town and the country district. It is desirable that the country merchant should not be crushed out.

Statements from such sources have naturally attracted wide attention, and a discussion of the subject has been going on over the country with unusual vigor, with the result that petitions for and remonstrances against this new governmental activity have been pouring in on Members of the Congress at both ends of the Capitol.

OUR POSTAL SERVICE.

The mail service of all countries is primarily for the dissemination of information. One of the standards of a nation's enlightenment is the perfection of its system for intercommunication among its people, and as a rule the relation of the cost to the income of the service is a matter of secondary consideration. Largely educational, having much to do with the sacred ties of friendship, and being an indispensable handmaid of business activities, nations have regarded the item of cost as one of the natural burdens of government to be borne by their respective systems of taxation, the postal receipts being but an incidental part of that system. Personal communications in the form of letters, more public utterances found in periodicals, and more enduring forms of intelligence found in books, maps, etc., have been carried far and wide in the most expeditious manner and at the minimum of cost—never, I believe, in the history of this country at an expense equal to the cost of the service. Yet no one complains at the annual postal deficit. It is charged off to our educational system, the value of which is never measured by dollars and cents.

THE MOVEMENT OF MERCHANDISE.

The carrying of parcels of merchandise, however, is a very different thing. It bears scarcely no relation whatever to the governmental function above referred to. One is essentially educational; the others purely commercial.

While this country has long carried some merchandise in the mails, it has not encouraged that department of the service. Prior to 1863 the weight of the package was limited to 3 pounds, and since then it has been but 1 pound more, the rate being 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof—16 cents the pound.

THE NEW PLAN.

The Postmaster-General's plan now is to enlarge the weight of the package received and reduce the rate, thus openly bidding for this line of business. It is true he limits the scope of these operations to the minimum, confining the origin and destination of each package to the rural routes out of a common terminus.

One is strongly inclined to regard this as merely an entering wedge. I am perfectly sure that it will not satisfy the people, but, on the contrary, will operate to increase the demand for this form of governmental service generally throughout the country. It has not been asked for by either the merchant on the routes, nor by the patrons served by them. It would accommodate but a small per cent of the people, and those whose rights to such a service are no more urgent than that of many others. The people in and about the thousands of small villages strung along the railroads will demand and should receive as good facilities for trading at the larger towns and cities as those along the rural routes; and in the West the people living in the remote valleys, off the main lines of communication, and served only by star-route mails, are more in need of mail privileges in their trading than either of the former groups, because their isolation makes it more difficult to visit the larger centers of trade. These, as well as those in and about small villages, usually have but one or two local stores at which to trade, stocks from which to select are small, and the belief at least prevails that prices are high. Rural routes usually radiate from the larger centers and swinging around in belt-line fashion are at no point far from a city of considerable size. Hence the patrons served are the best able of either of these three groups of people to reach a satisfactory trading place.

I am equally certain that the merchants at the beginning of the rural routes do not want their customers to form a habit of trading by mail. They want them to come to the store in person to do their buying. Their advertisements teem with special offers to purchasers in person. Cranberries to-day, some garden tool to-morrow, with laces or ginghams, are offered at frequent intervals below cost price in order to bring the farmer or his good wife into the store, the expectation being that once there they will see and buy many other things, some of which, at least, might have been done without had they not been pressed on their attention by the merchant.

From a social and mental standpoint, too, it is not profitable, but absolutely injurious, to the country to induce farmers and their families to remain too close to the farm. There is no class of people in the country who work as many hours a day as these, and none who normally enjoy as little of the cheer and benefit of association with others as our rural folk. They recreate too little already; they are predisposed to tarry at home and toil incessantly—a thing especially true of the patient, industrious wives of our farmers—and to take away their chief incentive to take a holiday—the occasional trip to town for necessary purchases—is a matter of much actual seriousness.

THE QUESTION TO BE MET.

The demand for the larger postal service comes chiefly from the rural districts, but it is not sought that they may trade more easily at their home town or city, but because they hear of advantages to be had at a more remote metropolis. "Distance lends enchantment" to the view of those properly in search of bargains, and whether the honorable Postmaster-General so meant it or not, the real question to be met is whether it is wise for the Government to embark on a wider field of the carrying trade of the country.

MARKETING PRODUCE.

It may be observed at this point that the carrying by mail of occasional purchases is by no means all that this new venture means. The demand is already made in this country, and it has been acceded to in some foreign countries, that the rates be made low enough to permit of the ready marketing of farm produce as well as the output of factories. I have frequently heard farmers' clubs and institutes discuss the advantages of a parcels post that would enable them to send their eggs to market, milk to the creamery, and their vegetables and fruits to the people of the cities generally.

Some European countries now perform these services by mail, and the traveler may see great quantities of hams, bacon, and fresh meats, and the products of poultry and dairy farms as well as of the truck garden at the post-office ready to go to the larger markets. I have read of a case even where a small child was sent home to its parents by mail at the end of its visit.

A writer in the Outlook of date December 14, 1907, presents a fanciful picture of what would come to pass if our Government were to enter upon this enlarged service. The article is in the form of an imaginary report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General in 1912 on our postal service, and begins with this paragraph:

The United States rural mail service now covers all the traffic within a rural route and provides for a regular interchange of persons, produce, and ordinary mail matter, morning and afternoon, between different routes and the outside world. The new service furnishes organized transport facilities for the education of the children and for the occupation and recreation of the whole population outside their homes.

Then follows the details, all exhibiting a socialistic scheme of the most advanced type. The children are carried to school, the adults to and from their employment or on journeys of pleasure, farm produce is carried to market and merchandise brought back—all at prices which no individual would think of duplicating if insured all of the business.

An enthusiastic member of the British Parliament, writing on this subject in the Arena a few years ago, said:

One can sympathize with the firm rejection of live creatures, such as the snakes, leeches, and insects exchanged by the ardent naturalist. But why is the dog, the friend of man, refused; or grimalkin, best ornament of the fireside, or sturdy chanticleer, while an exception is made in favor of bees?

In the same article the writer describes the result of the system in Germany in these glowing terms:

I shall never forget my inspection of the parcels-post building at Berlin. Such grim bustle, such ordered haste, such sudden surges of uniformed tollers, such mountains of baskets, boxes, parcels, melting down into yawning vans; * * * cocks crowed in their crates, huge mastiffs bayed, canaries from the Harz, shrilly piped; the huge yard of dispatch could have furnished a fair or supplied a settlement; and everything was sent off at the right time without a hitch, while Herr Karl Kirchhoff, the organizer and director of all, stood like an admiral on his bridge to see that all went well.

One of our consuls-general at a German port, writing in the Catholic World for June, 1905, describes the service rendered by the postal department in that country as follows:

The parcels post brings fish from the North Sea, the colonial products from the seaport towns, the dairy products from Switzerland, the wines from the Rhine Valley, the fruits of Italy, and the vegetables of the whole south into the heart of Germany.

Another one, speaking of a different branch of the service, says:

An enterprising manufacturer can send his traveler abroad and take small orders for his products, guaranteeing speedy delivery and low transportation charges, when his country has a parcels-post connection with foreign countries. A large exporting business can thus be developed from small beginnings.

I consider it entirely safe to say that if we enter upon this new field the extent and scope of the work above suggested will be speedily reached. We should take careful note at the outset of what the undertaking means, for once entered upon, even in the modest way suggested by the Postmaster-General, it will be found more and more difficult to stop.

IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The sentiment in favor of this new governmental service has been built up in this country chiefly by holding up to view more or less highly painted pictures of what is being done along a similar line in the countries of Europe. Any fair comparison of the postal service in those countries and in ours must take into consideration density of population, expanse of country or length of transportation routes, and the ownership of the means of transportation. The density of population and the relative size of the United States and of the principal countries of Europe having a cheap parcels post are shown by the following table:

Country.	Area.	Ratio of size.	Population.	Population per square mile.
	Sq. miles.
United States	3,602,990	100	84,154,009	23.35
Great Britain	121,391	3.36	41,976,827	345.79
Germany	208,860	5.79	60,641,278	290.34
France	207,054	5.74	38,961,945	139.87
Belgium	11,373	.31	7,074,970	622.08
Italy	110,550	3.06	32,475,253	293.76
Switzerland	15,976	.44	3,315,443	207.73

These figures are extremely interesting and important in connection with this subject. We constantly lose sight of the immensity of this country and its "magnificent distances," as compared with the nations of Europe; but in considering a question of transportation, distances and density of population stand in the foreground. Let it be observed, for instance, that while our country is over 300 times as large as Belgium, the latter has a population of 622 people to the square mile, while we have but a fraction over 23. Yet we will hear it argued that "Belgium carries 132-pound parcels by mail; why can not we?" or, "If Switzerland can carry 110-pound parcels, why not the United States?" entirely ignoring or forgetting the fact that our country is 250 times as large as Switzerland and has about one-tenth the population in a given area. Postal authorities have estimated that the average distance traveled by a piece of mail, including letters, papers, and parcels, is 40 miles in Great Britain, 42 miles in Germany, and 540 miles in the United States. Of course it is still less in the smaller countries of Europe. The admission of paper mail to this calculation greatly reduces the average, since newspapers circulate chiefly in the vicinity of the city of their publication. Parcels of merchandise or produce would certainly move much farther on an average, because they would chiefly flow to and from the great cities. If one is going to trade by mail, and the cost of delivery is the same, why not go to "headquarters," which, in the popular mind, means one of the larger cities in the country?

The maximum parcel carried by the principal nations is as follows:

	Pounds.
United States	4
Great Britain	11
Germany	110
France	22
Belgium	132
Switzerland	110
Austria	110

RAILROAD OWNERSHIP.

Another factor of equal importance is the nature of ownership of the means of transportation. In this country all routes are privately owned and operated. The railroads—the chief means of transporting the mails—have been constructed for the most part by private capital, without the aid of the Government, and the Government, like individuals, must pay a rate for its service which will yield a fair return to the owners. The roads in the foreign countries used in this comparison are largely owned by the governments, in which case it matters little whether merchandise and produce move by mail or by freight. In some of the countries, as in France, the government guarantees the interest on the capital invested in the roads, and in return has its mails carried free or at a nominal rate.

The English writer above referred to says of the mail-carrying situation in Germany:

The German post has no occasion to enforce heavy rates. It can impose its own terms on the railway companies. By law these have to carry free all parcels under 11 pounds in weight. Thus the mistake which has crippled the activity of the British parcels post has been avoided.

Of course there can be no just comparison between a service carried on under such conditions and ours, for the basic conditions are so fundamentally dissimilar.

The matter of railroad ownership lies at the very foundation of this question. If this Government owned the roads and operated them, it would matter little what went forward as mail and what under another designation. But that is not the case now and it is to be hoped never will be. From this standpoint, as well as from those hereinbefore mentioned, it is manifestly unfair to argue that because other countries do so and so in their mail service, therefore we should do the same.

It is significant that no country giving a large service of the kind under consideration undertakes to say that its receipts equal the cost of the service. I have not been able to find any report showing the cost of the parcels department. It is stated by some pretty high authority that the general belief among these nations is that they are rendering it at a loss. It is hard to reconcile that condition of the business with any idea of fairness. We may properly carry on the educational feature of the mail service, in part, out of the general revenue of the Government; but who will say that we may fairly carry the individual's produce to market or his merchandise home for him at public expense in whole or in part? Why should all the people be taxed to pay a postal deficit created by moving freight for the people at less than the cost of service? Is there any reason why this branch of pure business should be conducted at public expense which would not justify the performance by the Government of any other department of business?

THE POLITICAL PHASE.

And this brings into view the political phase of the case. Should this Government engage in purely business activities of any kind?

Of late years there has been a growing tendency to say, when dissatisfaction arises over some existing condition of things, "Let the Government do it." Neither political party is free from this charge, but both have sought to curry favor in this way until, undoubtedly, many seeds of Socialism have taken root. Thoughtful men in neither party favor that end, and probably a large majority believe that it would prove fatal to our institutions. Yet, not a few well-meaning citizens urge us to take "just this step" in that direction, and to gain a temporary advantage we are coming to suggest such things quite too often. Carrying produce to market is no part of the functions of this Government as planned by the fathers, any more than the planting or harvesting of the crop would be. There is not a single argument in favor of the parcels post that does not tend to prove by the same amount that the Government should set up a shoe factory or open a bakery for all. Each and all would be outside the realm of government as planned by the architects of the nation and foreign to that interesting and beneficial spirit of individualism which has brought us such marked results as a people.

Rest assured that if we begin by carrying the dairyman's milk to the creamery, we will end by milking the cows and manufacturing the butter. There will be no stopping place between these stations. And why, indeed, should one be sought? If that supposedly all-powerful thing vaguely referred to as "the Government" is to carry one business burden for us, why not load them all on? Father Government is not supposed to know either weight or weariness.

INTERNATIONAL PARCELS POST.

But in order to induce a beginning in this new departure it is pointed out that we already carry larger parcels and at lower rates to foreign points than between two domestic offices. This is true in a sense. But 4 pounds can be sent from one post-office in the United States to another, and the rate is 16 cents per pound, while as high as 11 pounds may be mailed at a domestic office if the destination of the parcel be a point in certain foreign countries.

By international postal conventions we have the following service:

Venezuela	11		12	12
Windward Islands (Grenada, St. Vincent, the Grenadines, and St. Lucia)	11		12	12

These figures, while proving the contention just stated, largely refute it. Literally we may send larger packages out of this country than from point to point at home. But what does it signify that we may send 11-pound parcels to Barbados or the Windward Islands? Who wants to traffic with these unimportant countries? I venture to say that not one man in a thousand who advocates the parcels post ever had occasion to send a parcel of any weight to one of these countries. Most assuredly the farmers, mechanics, etc., are not benefited by this privilege.

It will be observed that the countries with which we have greatest commercial intercourse exchange only the 4-pound 6-ounce parcel with us, namely, Great Britain, Germany, Norway, etc. We have no parcels-post convention with France allowing more than our domestic 4-pound parcel.

The rate of postage charged on this international business should be noted. A single ounce, or any weight up to 1 pound, is 12 cents; our domestic rate is but 1 cent for each ounce. Similarly, any fraction over a pound takes the rate of the full pound in international business. Thus 1 ounce would cost from 12 to 20 cents international, against 1 cent domestic; or 1 pound and 1 ounce international would cost 24 to 40 cents, against 17 cents domestic. So we have not discriminated so badly against local business after all.

OUR DOMESTIC SERVICE.

How far does our present service, limited to a 4-pound parcel, meet the real needs of the people? Are we not meeting the practical requirements of the people? Practically every article of wearing apparel of women and children that would be intrusted to the mails may now be sent, and a pretty good suit of clothes for a man will be carried. A very wide range of presents may be exchanged by post—one of the primary purposes of this service—as witness the volume of business done at the holiday season. Local merchants without competition find in our mail privileges a very salutary restraint on their prices, for their customers may send away for a large part of their daily needs if local conditions justify it. In stress of weather or of work the post will bring a temporary supply of groceries, but leaves intact the meritorious incentive for the farmer and his wife to drive into town occasionally. But the postal rates and privileges do not and should not permit buyers to send their trade to remote cities to the destruction of local businesses. The rights of the country merchant are as much a proper thing for our consideration as are the desires of the buyers. Every store that is built adds value to the surrounding farms, and the larger the town or city the greater the value of the adjacent holdings and the greater the opportunities of all kinds of craftsmen. If it were proper for the Government to embark in the carrying trade, it would not be wise for it to throw its weight into the balance against the country towns, for these rallying points are of inestimable value socially, politically, and financially to the whole country. They give equilibrium and homogeneity of the very first importance to our institutions. It will be a sad day for the country if it shall ever resolve itself into the two extremes—the great city and the uninterrupted rural district. The country town is the bond that binds all avocations together and makes the nation truly democratic in thought and custom. [Applause.]

He also introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5929) granting an increase of pension to Alexander Gardner;

A bill (S. 5930) granting a pension to David E. Hendricks;

A bill (S. 5931) granting an increase of pension to J. R. Hayes; and

A bill (S. 5932) granting an increase of pension to Theodore F. Snyder (with accompanying papers).

Mr. PILES introduced a bill (S. 5933) granting an increase of pension to Rudolph Kahls, which was read twice by its title and, with the acompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McENERY introduced a bill (S. 5934) granting a pension to Dacie I. Stoddard, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5935) granting a pension to Mrs. Andrew S. Graham, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 5936) referring to the Court of Claims the claim of Elizabeth H. Rice, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HEMENWAY introduced a bill (S. 5937) granting an increase of pension to John K. Owen, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NELSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 65) authorizing the Secretary of War to award the Congressional medal of honor to Guy C. Pierce and Thomas H. Nolan, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,000 for the completion of the enlargement, extension, remodeling, and improvement of the Government building at Wichita, Kans., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON submitted an amendment proposing to raise the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service to a standing committee of the Senate, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEMENWAY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $195,000 for investigations looking to the prevention of the destruction from mine fires of coal and other mineral deposits belonging to the Government, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO THE OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. SCOTT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

ROOM FOR JOINT COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following resolution, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Joint Committee on Revision of the Laws be authorized to rent a room in the Bliss Building for the use of the employees of said committee from February 1, 1908, at a monthly rental not to exceed $25.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. ALDRICH submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum until otherwise provided for.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES IN OKLAHOMA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3409) to extend the time of payments on certain homestead entries in Oklahoma, which was, in line 14, after "made," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That as a condition precedent to said extension in each case the settler shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, to be held in trust by him for the benefit of the Indian entitled thereto, 4 per cent on the amount of such deferred payments where such settler had no preference right and 5 per cent on the amount of the deferred payments where such settler was given a preference right: And provided further, That all persons, or their legal assignees, whose applications to purchase any of the pasture land mentioned in the act of June 28, 1906 (and whose applications were rejected because such persons were sublessees), shall have the right to purchase under the provisions of this act the land so originally applied for by them.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 16860. An act to establish a United States land district in the Territory of New Mexico, to be known as the Tucumcari land district, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. R. 17511. An act to construct a bridge at Parkdale, Ashley County, Ark., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BANK LOANS UPON COLLATERAL SECURITY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. TILLMAN, as follows:

Whereas many banks in cities where stock exchanges are located loan money of depositors which are trust funds upon worthless stocks and bonds traded in on these stock exchanges on terms that make such loans most dangerous, putting banks making such loans in a position of menace to the public: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Comptroller of the Currency be directed to send to the Senate at the earliest day possible a detailed statement of all loans made by the national banks in New York City upon collateral security during the six months from June 1, 1907, to December 1, 1907, such statement setting out in full names of borrowers, amounts of loans, lists of stocks and bonds deposited with each loan as collateral security, and also stating whether such loans are time or call loans and whether call loans are made by executive officers of the several banks or by order of the board of directors of the several banks.

Mr. ALDRICH. I would suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that he allow the resolution to go to the Committee on Finance. The resolution in its preamble and in the form of the resolution itself is, to my mind, very objectionable. I think a resolution can be prepared that will answer the purposes of the Senator and not have the objectionable features which are in the resolution as it now stands.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Rhode Island indicate the objectionable features?

Mr. ALDRICH. There are quite a number of objectionable features in the resolution. One is most objectionable, I think, from every public standpoint, and that is the provision which calls upon the Comptroller of the Currency to furnish us the names of all persons who had loans in the banks of New York on collateral, the amount of loans, and the amount of collateral. I think it would take months to get this information, and I think it would be the very worst thing the Senate of the United States could do under existing conditions to call for such information.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Or under any conditions.

Mr. ALDRICH. Or under any conditions.

Mr. TILLMAN. Would it answer the purpose not to give the names, but to indicate the character of the loans by one, two, three, and limit the collateral to stocks and bonds?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What does the Senator mean by the character of the loans?

Mr. TILLMAN. I say the collateral.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said "to indicate the character of the loans by one, two, three." What does the Senator mean?

Mr. TILLMAN. I mean, instead of saying Hon. ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE borrowed $2,000 and deposited collateral, to say "We loaned to an individual, No. 1," who would therefore be unidentified, "$2,000." That is what I mean.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I do not ask the Senator to yield. I am satisfied that no arrangement can be made between the two Senators, and I object to the consideration of the resolution this morning.

Mr. ALDRICH. The resolution came over from yesterday.

Mr. TILLMAN. We were trying to come to some understanding, and I had a little conference with the Senator from Rhode Island. I think the Senator from Maine is entirely mistaken that we can not have some consensus of view here. My purpose, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HALE. Very well, if the Senators can agree.

Mr. ALDRICH. My suggestion was that the resolution should go to the Committee on Finance, and I thought if it were there, we could prepare a resolution which would answer all the proper purposes which the Senator from South Carolina has in view.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wanted the Senator from Rhode Island to indicate what were the improper purposes the Senator from South Carolina had in view.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have suggested one which it seems to me is manifestly wrong.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, that is, of course, a matter of opinion, and I yield to the superior wisdom of my friend from Rhode Island; but I want to say to the Senator from Maine that I do not think he has ever found that it expedited business to undertake to press a man off the floor and push aside business that was objectionable to a Senator.

Mr. HALE rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. I have been too long in the Senate with the Senator from South Carolina to believe that I or anybody else can take him from the floor when he is entitled to it, as he is now. I only suggested (and I think he will see the force of it) that this matter go over another day. The Senator from Rhode Island informs me that he prefers that it should not go over.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Maine should recall that the resolution went over for a day, and that under the rules it is now up for consideration. I have a right to discuss it up until 2 o'clock, if I see fit.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; but it seemed to me if the Senators would confer together, perhaps by to-morrow morning they might agree upon a resolution that would pass unanimously. It looked to me as though it was possible at the moment for the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Rhode Island to agree, and my suggestion was only made as a matter of business, that it might enable the two Senators to agree upon something that we could pass and which might have some good effect. But of course if the Senator thinks it is better to go on and try to put the matter through as it is, I have nothing to say.

Mr. TILLMAN. The matter has not had any discussion whatever, and I was endeavoring in my feeble way to give the motive and object I had in introducing it. I am going to agree to the reference, because I can not help myself. The side over there will necessarily vote that it shall go to the Committee on Finance, and it will go there whether or not I want it.

I was trying to explain it so that the committee, when it gets it, will understand that I do not care to have any inquisitorial investigation into the private affairs of borrowers in New York or elsewhere, but I am endeavoring to arrive at the facts in relation to the subject of stock gambling and the flimsy securities which are very often taken by the banks in loaning money to these stock gamblers which belongs to their depositors. I do not give a snap about the name of any individual who has done this.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator prefers that the committee shall deal with this subject, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. DEPEW. I do not see why the inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina should be addressed simply to the banks in New York.

Mr. TILLMAN. That was all discussed yesterday. If the Senator from New York was not present and did not hear it, I will say that I am perfectly willing to take into the scope of the inquiry every exchange city or city where there is a gambling exchange located.

Mr. DEPEW. There is no doubt that whatever is charged against New York is done in an equal if not a more exaggerated form in nearly every city in the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Most States have shut up the bucket shops, and if New York would shut up its bucket shop or its gambling hell, known as "the Stock Exchange," all the rest of the little fish around in the United States might get a chance to come to maturity rather than be swallowed in their infancy.

Mr. DEPEW. I think if it was not for the New York exchanges the State of South Carolina would be closely shut up, and so would nearly every State in the Union, so far as the development of its industries, the extension of railways, or the building of factories are concerned.

Mr. TILLMAN. We never have discovered that New York was doing all that from patriotism or from any disinterested motive. So the Senator gains nothing by that remark. We pay New York for everything we get from there, and we pay very high for it.

Mr. DEPEW. The reason why they come to New York is that they can not get the money anywhere else.

Mr. TILLMAN. And I want a provision in the bill, which we will discuss very soon, by which we can get something without having New York stand and hold us up and say, "Now pay or get out and starve." That is what we are fighting for, sir.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator would not develop what he is seeking to secure. The disclosure of what loans are made upon time and what are made upon demand would not reveal what are gambling loans and what are made for legitimate purposes. It is perfectly safe to say that the majority of those loans in the banks of New York are for legitimate business purposes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DEPEW. And that time loans may be gambling loans just as much as demand loans. The banks of New York are not in business for fun.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; we have discovered that to our sorrow.

Mr. DEPEW. And they are not in business for the purpose of loaning the moneys of their stockholders or of their depositors upon rotten securities. I do not know of any banks anywhere where the banks are more solid, where they weather the storm better, where they stand so well as the banks of New York City.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yet, when the storm broke, your trust companies and your banks refused to meet the drafts of their depositors in the South and West. They shut us up, closed us out of business, and we are seeking a remedy here in the bill proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island and through various amendments. Now, I am seeking to get some information in regard to this question of stock gambling, and that is all.

Mr. DEPEW. I would be perfectly willing to aid the Senator in any effort to reach stock gambling that would suppress it, but I do not think disclosing the secrets of legitimate business people, firms, corporations, and all that, would tend to do that. On the contrary, it would create an amount of distrust and simply accentuate present evils.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then the Senator confesses that the banks of New York are loaning money contrary to good business principles. The Senator confesses right here that the banks dare not openly explain the character of their loans and the character of their collateral.

Mr. DEPEW. That is equivalent to saying that we who are sitting here and are not bankers are better judges of the banking business than the men who have spent their lives in it.

Mr. TILLMAN. But as we make laws to govern the national banks it is our duty, I imagine, to make such laws as to protect depositors and also to stop this gambling—if we can do it.

Mr. DEPEW. If the Senator will confine his attention to gambling I shall be very happy to join him.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. President, it was the suggestion of the Senator from Maine that perhaps the Senator from Rhode Island and myself will agree on a resolution. I will leave it entirely to the Senator, for he knows the object I have in view, and that is to get the facts without regard to the names. I do not want anybody's name disclosed here. I drew the resolution rather hurriedly, and I am indifferent as to whether it shall go over or whether it shall be referred to the committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then it may go to the committee, and I think we will have no trouble if it is the Senator's purpose to find out the nature and extent of the so-called "stock-exchange transactions" in the banks of New York.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I am after finding out the character and extent of collateral which the banks are taking.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not think we have any right to do that. I am quite willing that the resolution shall go to the committee and then——

Mr. TILLMAN. We will wait until to-morrow morning, and the Senator and I may talk the matter over. If we can not agree about a formal resolution, then the committee will take it in hand.

Mr. ALDRICH. I want the committee to take it in hand anyhow. I do not want to take any responsibility about a matter of this kind, and I desire to have the resolution go to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course it will go there; I understand that; but I am very much surprised to see the sudden growth of modesty and unwillingness to take responsibility on the part of the Senator from Rhode Island. It is an entirely new development in his attitude here.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am quite willing that a vote shall be taken on the resolution now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course; the Senator would have his own way, because his followers or friends over there, or whatever he calls them, would all vote with him, I know.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF THE NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I ask the Chair to lay the unfinished business before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws of the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, the debate on the pending bill has taken a wide range. It is not my purpose, however, to enter into a discussion respecting the various measures that have been offered in the Senate and sent to the Committee on Finance providing for various schemes of banking and currency legislation. This is not the time to attempt to revolutionize our present banking system. Indeed, it is not the time to discuss the question as to whether the present banking system of the United States consists of patchwork legislation, as is contended by some Senators, or as to whether it embodies as good a system if not better than any that has heretofore been had or can be devised for the American people.

I am well aware that some of the ablest thinkers on financial subjects in this country contend that the central bank with branch banks is far superior to our present system. That, however, is too radical a change to be considered at this time. We can not make any material change in the present system now, and all that the present bill purports to do is to provide means by which to prevent a repetition of the financial panic that commenced in the last days of October, 1907. The Aldrich bill, so called, does not in any particular interfere with the normal banking conditions of the country, either State or national. It throws no obstacle in the way of the development of State and savings banks in the various States of the Republic and puts no restriction upon the further development of the national banking system that now numbers 6,625 national banks, scattered over the forty-six States of the Union. The panic that commenced on the 26th day of October last, it is believed by the framer of this bill and by the Finance Committee who reported it, could have been checked in its incipient stages if this bill had been upon the statute book and the machinery for placing $500,000,000 more money in circulation had been at the disposal of the national banks of the country.

The question as to whether a different banking system should be adopted by the Government, or as to whether the central bank with its branches which would create an entire revolution in our banking system is better than our present system, is one that is left open for future discussion and for future determination. The interests involved are too great to consider a subject of that kind just as we are entering upon a great national campaign for the election of a President and Vice-President, where the two great political parties that have been contending for generations for supremacy in this country are again to appeal to the people—the one to be continued in power and the other to be restored to favor and power. If there is any question that should be entirely devoid of politics that is considered by the Congress of the United States, it is the banking and financial policy of the Government. It is apparent to all men who are familiar with legislation that this great question can not now be dispassionately considered. It must be taken up at a period when Senators and Members of the House of Representatives will forget their political affiliations and seek by every method that honorable men can to improve the financial and banking conditions of this country.

No Senator who favors this bill believes that it is a panacea for all of our financial ills. No Senator contends that it is perfect in all of its details. What we do contend, however—those of us who favor it—is that it is the very best legislation that can be obtained for the relief of the people of the United States at this time.

The additional circulating notes provided for in this bill are to be of the same character as the notes that are issued by the various national banks of the country, and the bill holder will not know from an examination of the note as to whether it is issued under existing law or is a part of the emergency circulation provided for in the pending bill. The additional circulating notes provided for in this bill can all be put into circulation without attracting the attention of those who are not close students of the financial condition of the country and whose financial interests are not such as to keep them well informed as to the financial stringency or otherwise of the money market of the country.

The Comptroller of the Currency is directed as soon as this bill becomes a law to provide notes for all of the several national banks of the United States, with their several proportions of the additional currency that is contemplated in this bill, and the same will be deposited with the Treasurer or subtreasurers nearest the banks, so that within twenty-four hours of the time that there is a call made by any particular bank, if the emergency exists that is provided for in the bill, the bank can have the use of this additional currency. If the additional currency that is contemplated in this bill were different in its outlines and appearance from the national-bank note that is now in circulation, the moment that it made its appearance in the channels of trade it would be a notice to everybody that the financiers and great bankers of the country at least believed that a great financial emergency existed, and it would thus be a red flag to precipitate a run upon the banks and create a condition of panic that the bill is intended to provide against. The notes being identical in all of their features with the notes that the banks have in circulation, this condition is provided against, and, with the amount of currency that is provided for in the bill, every requirement can be met by the banks where financial stringency exists, and the general public will not realize or appreciate that there have been or were likely to be financial disturbances.

The basis for this additional circulation is to be not the interest-bearing bonds of the United States, but is to be bonds or interest-bearing obligations of any State of the United States, or any legally authorized bonds issued by any city, town, county, or other legally constituted municipality or district in the United States which has been in existence for a period of ten years, with certain limitations as to the character of those bonds, and also first-mortgage bonds of any railroad company which, in compliance with existing law, reports regularly to the Interstate Commerce Commission a statement of its condition and earnings, and which has paid its dividends of not less than 4 per cent per annum regularly and continuously on its entire capital stock for a period of not less than five years previous to the deposit of the bonds. Authority will be given under the law for the Interstate Commerce Commission to appraise the value of the physical properties of the railroads whose bonds are to be used as a basis for this additional circulation. In order that the banks of the country may know what bonds are eligible for this service, it is provided in the bill that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain information with reference to the value and character of the municipal and railroad securities authorized to be accepted under the provisions of this bill, and he shall from time to time furnish information to national banking associations as to such bonds as would be acceptable as security under the provisions of this act. This provision of the bill will enable the president and other officers of every national bank in the United States to know before any emergency arises for additional currency just what State, county, or municipal bonds can be used for the purpose of the additional currency sought to be obtained by the individual bank, and what railroad bonds; and, if the banker desires, these bonds can be procured in advance of any emergency and held as a part of the assets of the banks.

It is contended by some that the railroad bonds mentioned in the bill should not be used as a part of the basis for this emergency currency. I think it is due to the committee, Senate, and country that I should make a plain statement as to the reasons that prompted the committee in adding railroad bonds of the character described in the bill.

It was found by the committee after full investigation that there were not State, county, town, and other municipal bonds of sufficient number and amount to afford a basis for a superstructure such as is proposed by the issuing of the $500,000,000 of this additional emergency currency. It was believed by the committee that if we limited the bill to State, county, city, town, and other municipal bonds, a corner could be engineered upon these bonds in an emergency to raise the price of them to a figure that would make it impossible for the banks to procure them, and thus defeat the very purposes of this bill. The committee then took into consideration the best means of providing for additional bonds. The selection of the class of railroad bonds mentioned in the bill was by a process of elimination. When it was determined that State, county, and other municipal bonds were not sufficient as a basis for the issuing of the $500,000,000 of additional currency, the committee then considered what other class of securities should be added to these bonds. The advocates of asset currency claimed that the promissory notes of John Doe or Richard Roe would be sufficient. The committee, however, rejected the suggestion as one that would not meet with the approval of the Senate or the country.

The next proposition that was considered was as to whether industrial bonds could be used for this purpose. We have great corporations engaged in industries where bonds to the amount of many millions of dollars are upon the market. These corporations, however, are not under the immediate control of Congress. The bonds at times fluctuate in value, and they were not regarded with favor by the committee.

Another class of securities that was considered were bonds that were issued by public utilities companies, like gas companies and others in the various cities of the country, and bonds issued by street railroads in cities and by interurban roads. These all have a market value and are entitled to consideration; but the committee found, as Senators well know, that this class of bonds, like the bonds issued by industrial companies, are not under the immediate control of Congress and that they are liable to fluctuate in value much more than the bonds of well-established railroads that do an interstate-commerce business.

After a full investigation of all these classes of bonds, the committee determined that the highest class of securities which can be found outside of governmental bonds of the character above named should be recommended to the Senate. Those bonds of necessity are bonds issued by commercial railroads doing an interstate commerce business. A commercial railroad is a quasi public corporation. It has certain sovereign powers that are denied to the other classes of corporations that I have named. A commercial railroad is not only a quasi public corporation, but under the present law is under the immediate control of Congress through the Interstate Commerce Commission. Through the instrumentality of the Interstate Commerce Commission we can acquire information regarding the value and character of railroad bonds that are denied us in all other classes of bonds of those that I have already mentioned. The railroad bonds mentioned in the bill are the highest class of railroad bonds that are in the market.

These railroads that are doing an interstate-commerce business are required under the existing law to make annual reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission, giving a full and detailed statement of the condition of the roads, their indebtedness, expenses, etc. They are also required to give the value of the physical properties of the roads, the franchises, and, in fact, are required to give such information as will enable the Secretary of the Treasury to easily determine as to whether or not the bonds should be accepted as a basis for emergency currency. In fact, this class of bonds has already been received by the Secretary of the Treasury for Government deposits. The committee, therefore, believed that in recommending railroad bonds of the character described in the bill, they had safeguarded the Government in a manner that no person can with reason question.

Now, Mr. President, in selecting securities of this class the Senate Committee on Finance were not considering as to whether it would benefit one railroad over another. They recognized that in the great bond market of this country there are between six thousand million dollars and seven thousand million dollars in railroad bonds. Out of that great volume of bonds that to-day are in the market we had an opportunity to select the best class of securities.

I confess, Mr. President, with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], that I was somewhat surprised by the remarks made by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] on this subject. I supposed that in making a selection of this kind, if we had to resort to railroad securities, it was our duy to select the highest and best railroad bonds that were in the market. I did not suppose that any Senator would be governed and controlled in his vote on the question as to whether these bonds were issued by some small railroad in his State or not, but that the proposition which would be presented to the Senate and to the public would be as to whether the railroad bond is one which meets with the public requirements as expressed in this bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Illinois would not impute to me such an unworthy motive as his language would imply. As I stated in my observations on this feature of the bill, I want no railroad bonds included in it. I am not keen about any little railroad that may be left out. I want no railroad bonds introduced into our monetary system in the manner in which this bill provides.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the statement of the Senator from Michigan. I confess that I misunderstood his position, because I remember in the discussion of this bill day before yesterday the Senator made the point that no railroad in Michigan had issued bonds which could come within the requirements of this bill.

Mr. SMITH. That was merely by way of illustration of the fact that the general mileage of the country secured by bond and mortgage would not be benefited by this policy, but that it would benefit only the few railroads that came within its provisions. I am opposed to any railroad securities being introduced into this measure.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, there can be no disagreement then between the Senator from Michigan and myself upon that subject. I simply referred to it because of the fact that he made a criticism upon the class of bonds which we have in the bill, and the point he made was that the bonds that were issued upon certain railroads in Michigan would not come within the requirements of the bill.

Now, as to the policy of selecting some of the railroad bonds for the purpose of forming a basis for the issue of this currency, I think I have already explained that we were driven to the selection of railroad bonds because there is no other class of securities in the country that would meet the requirements, and in order to make this bill effective, we must have a bond basis broad enough, so that this $500,000,000, or this thousand million dollars, as the case may be, can be issued without any material increase in the price of the bonds that are used as a basis for this additional circulation.

So, as I stated, we have been driven to the selection of the highest and best class of securities that there is in this country. As was stated by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] the other day, these bonds are well known to every person who is at all familiar with business.

I shall take up just for a moment some of the objections which were raised by the Senator from Michigan as his reasons why such bonds should not be taken. One of the arguments that he urged, Mr. President, was the fact, as he stated it, that it was an opening wedge to the Government ownership of railroads in this country. I confess that I do not sympathize with that statement of the Senator, because, upon an analysis of this bill and the business and monetary conditions of the country, it is utterly impossible that such a thing could occur.

How could the Government become the owner of a railroad under this bill? In what way? Let us look for a moment. The suggestion was made that the Government, in case of the foreclosure of such bonds, might be made a party to the suit. My first answer to that is that the Government of the United States, under existing law, can not be sued at all, and even if we had legislation which would permit the Government of the United States to became a party defendant to a suit of this character, under no condition would it become necessary for the Government to become a litigant, either complainant or defendant. If the interest on the bonds of a railroad company is defaulted by the railroad and conditions should arise where a bill is to be filed for foreclosure, that suit is commenced by the trustee under a trust deed. If the trustee refuses to act, there probably are provisions in the trust deed that will allow the majority of the bondholders to commence the suit; but, in my judgment, there is not a trust deed that has been executed by a railroad company for twenty years that would permit a minority of the bondholders to commence a suit of any kind.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am very much interested in what the Senator from Illinois says and I have great confidence in his judgment, but the trustee does not act automatically; the trustee acts when there is default and the person holding the bonds is fearful of loss. If the Government owns bonds and there shall be default, does the Senator from Illinois contend that the Government must sit idly by and take no step to protect its interest, involving, as it may, hundreds of millions of dollars?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, the assumption of the Senator from Michigan is that the Government of the United States will own the entire issue of bonds, or the majority of them, and that the Government will have to resort to this procedure for the purpose of securing itself against loss on such bonds. Now, if the Senator will hold himself in patience for a moment, I shall show him that that condition could not exist. I am simply calling attention now to the usual method by which there would be a foreclosure. It would be by the trustee, of course, acting on the request of the majority of the bondholders; but that would not necessitate the Government being a party to the suit. I undertake to say that under no condition—take the most radical that has been presented by the Senator from Michigan—would the Government of the United States become a party to such a lawsuit.

If a bank desires to take out $75,000 of additional currency, as provided in this bill, and to give railroad securities of the character provided, it must put up $100,000 worth of bonds. There is a margin of $25,000 on $100,000 worth of bonds. There has never been in the history of railroads engaged in interstate commerce an instance where the bonds of the character mentioned in the bill have fluctuated to the extent of the margin here provided.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the suggestion that the Government might, through the machinery of this bill, become a party to litigation involving the foreclosure of a mortgage on a railroad. I am curious to know how that state of affairs could come to pass.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will show the Senator how it can not come to pass.

Mr. CARTER. I wish to ask the Senator if it is not true that the bank issuing or calling for the currency and pledging the bonds is required by law upon demand to substitute other securities for those in the vaults of the Treasury? For instance, in case the railroad to which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] referred should be threatened with default or a receivership for any cause, may not the Secretary of the Treasury instantly call on the bank which has deposited these bonds for additional bonds as security or a substitution of other bonds?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Now, I want to know how this Government could become a party to the foreclosure of a railroad if upon the mere demand of the Secretary of the Treasury its defaulted bonds must be taken up and other bonds substituted for them?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I was coming to that in the course of my statement. I first desired to take up the radical proposition that was suggested by the Senator from Michigan and to show that in law and in fact there was no force or point to it. Then I propose to follow up the question suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], and that is this: That the bonds that are put up are not put up by the railroads at all; they are put up by the banks that seek to take out additional circulation. The Government of the United States has no direct dealings with any railroad whatever, but if the First National Bank of Chicago or New York or Detroit desires to have additional currency circulation and wants to use some of the bonds that are provided for in the bill and presents railroad bonds, that is a contract between the bank itself and the Government.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. If it will not annoy the Senator——

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH. I should like to have him include in his statement of the banks that may avail themselves of this privilege such banks as the Mercantile National, of New York, from whom the Government could not have obtained a dollar or additional security if it had asked for it when conditions were most serious. In such a case the Government would be driven to its security.

Mr. HOPKINS. We will take that up later, when we come to it. The point I am making is this: That it is a contract between the bank that seeks additional circulation and the Government. The bank comes to the Government with State, municipal, and railroad bonds. As suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], it is discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury to determine whether he will accept all railroad bonds or any of them. He may require the bank to put up State bonds or county bonds or municipal bonds of some kind, and certainly if there is anything in the history of any particular railroad bond that casts any reflection upon the ability of the railroad to pay it, the Secretary of the Treasury would instantly refuse to accept such a bond.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Providing the Secretary of the Treasury had previously accepted railroad bonds, may he under the bill require the bank to take up such bonds and substitute others for them?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly. That, Mr. President, can be done at any time. The bank is required to take them up on demand of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Suppose, however, that when the bank is called on the bank finds it can not take up the railroad bonds and substitute others?

Mr. HOPKINS. If a bank can not do that, Mr. President, then under this bill the Secretary of the Treasury can sell that bond either at public or private sale, even if he does not get for it more than 10 cents on the dollar, and can require the bank to put up additional security if the bank can do it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So the recourse, after all, is finally to the security, and not to the bank.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question, with a view of ascertaining whether this discussion is not largely academic, so far as it involves the Government being a party to any litigation for the purpose of realizing upon these securities. The question is this: Does the Senator know, or does any Senator know, of any interstate railroad in the United States that has paid dividends for five consecutive years upon its capital stock that ever was foreclosed upon its first mortgage?

Mr. HOPKINS. Never, Mr. President. There is not an instance in the history of railroading where that has occurred.

The Government, as I have said, is protected in every way against any loss upon this character of bonds, because the Secretary of the Treasury can not only require additional security to be put up, but can sell the bonds either at public or at private sale. That is not all the security that it provided for the proposed additional circulation. There are the assets of the banks, upon which the Government has a first lien. There is the capital stock of the bank itself, and there is the additional security that is given because of the liability of every stockholder for the amount of his stock. So that it is not within the range of possibility that any notes that are put out by the Government under the conditions of the pending bill will ever cause the Government any expense whatever.

Some point was made yesterday in the discussion that was had while the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] was speaking as to why the Government should have a first lien upon the assets of the bank. This bill has simply followed existing law. The purpose in adopting this legislation was to make as little change as possible. Under existing conditions the note holder has not only the Government back of him for the payment of the note, but he has the assets of the bank, the Government bond that is up, the capital stock of the national bank, and, in addition, the liability of the stockholders. In preparing this bill the Finance Committee believed that it was their duty to afford just as good security for the additional currency as that which is provided for the notes in circulation under existing law.

The next proposition is as to whether the effect will be to appreciate the value of one class of bonds and depreciate the other. My judgment is, Mr. President, that the appreciation in the value of the bonds selected will be a negligible quantity. The reason I say that is that there are two thousand million dollars of the bonds, of which only a small per cent will be taken probably, and none of them may ever be taken, because, as was said by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] yesterday, if this bill becomes a law and this provision is made whereby in an emergency $500,000,000 can be put in circulation in twenty-four hours, there will be no necessity for exercising that great power.

How can it influence the market value of the other four thousand millions of dollars of bonds? The value of those bonds is fixed and settled in the market to-day. Their value is as well known to people dealing in bonds as the value of a gold nugget is known to the assayer. There can not be any question whatever as to their value. All these railroad bonds are classified. We take the first class because they are of the highest value, and their security is the best; but all of the other bonds have their market price in the bond market of the country, and the selection of some, in my judgment, can not interfere with the others at all.

Some Senators have contended that there are not bonds enough of the classes enumerated here to meet the requirements of this additional currency without greatly enhancing the value of the bonds. I think, Mr. President, that this contention is unfounded in fact. I have had it from one of the greatest bond houses in America, that has its chief office in Chicago, that there are over two thousand millions of dollars of State, county, and municipal bonds of the character provided for in this bill now in existence that can be used for the purposes provided for in this bill, and that there are at least two thousand millions of dollars of railroad bonds that will easily meet the exacting requirements respecting the bonds that can be used. This gives a basis at once of four thousand millions of dollars of bonds as a fund to draw from. It seems to me, Mr. President, that there can be no question but that bonds sufficient to meet the necessities of the additional currency provided for in the bill can be obtained without materially affecting the value of these bonds in the market. They will furnish a safe and sound basis for this additional circulation.

Some criticism has been indulged in by different Senators and by the public generally because the bill does not provide that Government bonds can be used as well as State, county, municipal, and railroad bonds, and hold that it was a discrimination against the Government bonds. Limiting the character of the bonds in this bill to State, county, and other municipal and railroad bonds and excluding Government bonds was no oversight on the part of the Finance Committee or of Mr. ALDRICH, the chairman of the committee, who framed this bill. The reason why the Government bonds are not made a part of this basis for additional circulation is that the purpose of this bill is not to interfere in any particular with the present national banking system. The amount of the interest-bearing debt of the United States outstanding on November 1, 1907, was $858,685,510. The currency that is now in circulation by national banks, which aggregates $562,727,614, is all based upon the Government bonds that are held by the national banks; and, as Senators all know, every national bank that takes out a charter under existing conditions is required to procure bonds as the basis of its bank circulation. Chapter III of the national-bank act provides that each banking association shall trnsfer and deliver to the Treasurer of the United States any United States registered bonds bearing interest or Panama Canal bonds to an amount not less than one-fourth of the capital, the capital being $150,000 or less, as security for their circulating notes, and banks organized with a capital stock of $150,000 or over are required to have not less than $50,000 in bonds for the bank circulation and may, of course, have more.

National banks already hold $659,510,260 in these Government bonds for the purpose of bank-note circulation. I find from an examination of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency that $22,683,412 of Government bonds are held by State and savings banks. This leaves a balance of only $176,491,838 of Government bonds that are not absorbed by the national banks and State and savings banks. These bonds should be left for the further expansion of national banks in different sections of our common country.

An examination of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that from March 14, 1900, to October 31, 1907, 3,673 national bank associations were organized, with an aggregate capital of $215,430,300, and that the organization of these several banks required $52,692,530 of the Government bonds to be deposited with the Treasurer for circulation under the law that I have just quoted. Senators will see from this that the marvelous growth of our country in population, in industries of all kinds, in commerce and trade, has caused the remarkable increase in the number of national banks in the country. In the seven years that I have named here, national banks have more than doubled in number. This increase in the national banks in the country has not been in the business centers of old States and where well-established business conditions exist, but in the newer States and in sections of the older States where the banking facilities were not such as to meet the requirements of the commerce and trade of the particular locality.

An examination of the report of the Comptroller shows that of the number of banks that have been established during the period of which I have just spoken, 2,389 of them have a capital of $50,000 or less, and that the aggregate capital of these 2,389 banks amounts to only $62,312,500; and that the banks with a capital stock of $50,000 and upward number 1,284, with a capital of more than double that of the first class that I have named, namely, with a capital of $153,117,800.

Now, it is perfectly apparent from these figures that it is wisdom upon the part of Congress to refrain from interfering with these Government bonds until such time as Congress determines to change our entire banking system. So long as our banking system is conducted under the present national-bank act these bonds should be left for the creation of new banking associations as the growth of the country may demand. That it would be unwise to include Government bonds in this proposed emergency issue is made still more apparent when I call Senators' attention to the fact that during the seven years in which the national banks have increased in number to the amount of 3,673 the Government has paid of its national interest-bearing debt the sum of $198,176,610. In other words, Mr. President, since March 14, 1900, the Government has liquidated of its interest-bearing debt a sum larger than the present balance of bonds that are unused by the banks in the sum of $21,684,772.

With these conditions before us I feel sure that the majority of the Senators will agree with the chairman of the Finance Committee and with that committee that it would not be wise to include Government bonds in this additional issue of bank notes that is provided for in the bill.

It is very easy, Mr. President, for any Senator to take up the bill by sections and raise objections to it, as has been done by a number of the Senators who have spoken on the subject; but when you come to an analysis of those objections the force and effect of them fade away, as do the propositions of Senators and bankers of the country who have suggested different methods of meeting the emergency that is provided for in this bill. No legislation can be suggested that will not meet with objections, and serious objections, too. No great measure that affects the interests of the 85,000,000 of people in this country can be enacted into law without compromises and modifications from the idea of the originators of such legislation. Every person who is familiar with national legislation realizes that the very foundation of our Government—namely, our Constitution, that unites the forty-six States into one federated Republic—was a matter of compromise. Had the friends of the larger States insisted upon their rights as they were maintained by the citizens of those States, they never could have reached any basis of agreement with the smaller States that were ultimately formed into the Union. And from the days of our fathers who prepared this remarkable document to the present no great measure has been enacted into law that is not the result of various concessions and compromises upon the part of its advocates.

What the friends of this measure contend is that there are less valid objections that can be made against it than can be made against any other method that has been suggested in either branch of Congress. All are agreed that some legislation must be had, and when we come to the last analysis, with a fair consideration of all of the measures that have been suggested, it seems to me that an agreement must be reached that this bill represents more merit in reaching the evils sought to be provided against than any or all of the other measures that have been suggested.

I do not sympathize, Mr. President, with the carping criticism that has been indulged in, not only in the Senate, but in various newspapers in the country and by various bankers and financiers, that this is a measure that benefits the banks in one section of our country to the exclusion of another. If this measure is beneficial to the banks of New York or Chicago, it is beneficial to every national bank that is in existence to-day or that can be organized in the future under the present banking act. The banks of Texas and Oklahoma and California will receive, indirectly if not directly, the same benefit that is accorded the great banks of New York that have been denounced here again and again during the progress of this debate.

It is my judgment that the various banks in the different States in the Union can acquire easily and profitably some of the bonds that are enumerated in this bill as a basis for this additional circulation—quite as easily as can the large banks in Chicago or New York City; and that they can be held as a part of the assets of the bank with profit to safe banking, and, if an emergency arises, they can then be used as a basis of this additional circulation. But suppose, Mr. President, as was contended by the junior Senator from Georgia the other day, that the bonds that are provided for in this bill are largely held outside of the State of Georgia and other Western and Southwestern States—is that any reason that this bill should not be enacted into a law? Or is it any evidence that the banks in Georgia or any other section of our common country will not receive the benefit of the additional note circulation provided for in this bill?

Senators may rail at the banks in New York City as much as they please. They may denounce their banking and business methods to their heart's content. I shall not take issue with them as to whether those banks have been properly conducted or not. For my purposes in meeting the objections that have been raised, it is entirely unnecessary either to commend or condemn these New York banks. We all must admit that New York is the financial center of this country. We all must admit that every bank that is organized under the national-bank act, I care not whether it be in the State of Illinois or Georgia, Texas or California, must either directly or indirectly have business connections with one or more of the great banks in the city of New York. The business of the country can not be conducted by these banks in the several States outside of the great commercial centers without having their business connections with them. And I venture the assertion that there is not a bank in Texas or Georgia to-day, or in Oklahoma, that is doing a business of any considerable amount, but what either directly or indirectly has a correspondence or business relation with one of the great New York or Chicago banks.

It is the practice of banks all over this country to keep on deposit with the various banks in New York, especially, and, to quite a large degree, in Chicago, a part of their deposits as assets upon which they can draw their drafts and bills of exchange. This is not to benefit the New York bank or the Chicago bank, but it is to benefit the customers of the particular bank in Georgia or Texas or California or Oklahoma who desire a draft on one of the banks in the central cities of the country, and more particularly New York City.

A financial panic never has and never will arise at Nasby's Confederate Crossroads. It never has and never will arise in a country town where there is only a national bank of $25,000 or $50,000 capitalization. If a financial panic of any proportion whatever arises in this country, it will start where the financial center is—and that is, New York City. If the banks of New York City are not menaced by a financial panic and are in a sound normal condition, I care not what the currency stringency may be in any bank in Georgia, in Texas, in Oklahoma, or in California, or any of these States where they are insisting that they shall have a large amount of this additional currency, they can be protected from any shortage in their currency and can be tided over on any financial crisis that exists by the banks of New York, as they would be.

In other words, Mr. President, we shall never witness another financial panic in this country so long as the banks of New York are, and remain, in a safe and normal condition. So that this talk that New York is to get some advantage over the other banks of the country or over some other State or section of our country has no merit in it whatever.

When I hear Senators denounce the New York banks and insist that the bill under consideration favors them to the exclusion of the national banks in the several States, and that provision should be made in the bill that a little $25,000 bank in some rural district in Texas or Georgia shall have its proportionate share of the additional currency, regardless of the needs of the New York banks, I am reminded of Dean Swift's fable of The Stomach and the Members.

You will remember, Mr. President, that once on a time, as the fable runs, the arms and legs and other members of the human body decided that the stomach did nothing in time of need to aid or assist the heart. So they resolved that the stomach should be kept empty. They found, however, that when the stomach flagged for want of due nutrition each member pined and lagged and soon reached a poor and weak condition. On reflection they decided that it was wiser to allow the stomach to have plenty of food, even if it required a considerable effort on their part to bring this about, on the discovered fact that when the stomach waxed low the whole body weakened and died.

So, Mr. President, under our present banking system, in order to maintain the financial integrity of the banks of the country, there must be no disturbance of normal banking conditions in the city of New York. It is the very heart and center of the system, and if it is kept in a healthy condition no disturbance can reach any national bank in any State in the Republic if that bank is conducted on the principles that are set forth in the national-bank act.

As I have already stated, I can not undertake to answer all of the objections that have been made to the bill; neither can I consider all of the proposed amendments. Several Senators, however, have presented proposed amendments that, in one form or another, require the Government to guarantee to the depositor in any national bank the return of his money. I shall not undertake to take up these different proposed amendments and analyze them. While they are different in form, in principle they are the same. The one which has received the most attention is the amendment that was offered by the senior Senator from Minnesota, and it is to that, and to the argument which the Senator made in support of it, that I desire to direct the attention of the Senators for a brief period.

Mr. President, the senior Senator from Minnesota, in his very lucid argument here the other day, stated that the Government guaranteed the payment of all bank-note issues by the national banks of the country, and that he could see no reason why, on the same principle, the Government should not guarantee the depositor.

To my mind there is a wide difference between guaranteeing deposits and guaranteeing the currency issued by the national banks. In order to bring this difference in principle as clearly as I may before the Senate it will be necessary to refer to the act of February 25, 1863, which provided a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States stocks. The original act provided that the currency should not exceed the amount of $300,000,000, to be apportioned to banks of different States according to population and existing banking conditions and necessities. The notes were receivable for all Government dues except duties on imports and were payable by the Government except for its indebtedness and for the interest on its bonds.

In creating a national currency the Secretary of the Treasury had two great objects in view. The first was to destroy the issues of State banks and to create a uniform bank currency that would be good in all sections of our common country; and, secondly, to provide a market for the bonds of the Government of the United States, and thus enlist a strong, active financial interest in the general welfare of the Government's credit.

The national-bank act was of great benefit to the Secretary of the Treasury in floating the loans of the Government at a period when it was of the greatest financial importance to the Government that a good market should be found or formed. In addition to the financial support that the national-bank system afforded to the Secretary of the Treasury in caring for the finances of the Government and floating the national debt, it had a tendency to create a direct interest in support and maintenance of the General Government. These banks were organized in all of the various States of the Union, and each bank had a financial interest not only in the perpetuity of the Union, but it had a direct interest in having the finances of the Government on a sound basis, where no question could be raised as to the ability of the Government to pay the interest on its bonded indebtedness and to be in a position to liquidate that bonded indebtedness from time to time as the bonds matured.

The Secretary of the Treasury in making this recommendation to Congress and Congress in adopting these suggestions and passing the national-bank act were not looking to the interests of a single individual, but were thinking of the establishment of a great national policy that would benefit the Government and the people in the ways that I have briefly and imperfectly indicated.

The bank that was organized had as the basis of its circulation bonds issued by the Government that were to be paid some time in the future. On those bonds the bank had authority to issue 90 per cent of the par value of the bonds in currency that were legal tenders for all debts and contracts. The holder of each one of these notes thus issued by the bank had a direct interest with the stockholders and directors of the bank in not only the perpetuity of our constitutional form of government, but in the establishment of a stable financial condition in the Government itself.

It must be apparent, therefore, to every person familiar with the history of the organization of the national-bank system in this country, that the guaranteeing by the Government of the payment of the bank notes that are put into circulation as a part of the currency of the country was for national and not for individual reasons.

The Secretary of the Treasury in recommending this legislation and Congress in enacting it into law were not looking so much to the protection of the depositor. The depositor's relation to the bank is voluntary upon his part. The relation that he holds to the bank is that of creditor and debtor. The contract that is established between him and the bank is one that is entirely under his control. The terms and conditions under which he deposits his money can be fixed by himself and can be terminated at his will. No reason, therefore, exists why the Government should guarantee the return of his money that exists in the case of guaranteeing the note holder.

The several amendments to the pending bill looking to the guaranteeing of all deposits in national banks do not attempt either in spirit or letter to guarantee the deposits of private, State, savings, or loan and trust companies that do a banking business. They are limited, and of necessity must be limited, to the national banks of the country.

We have 6,625 national banks scattered over the forty-six States that form this federated Republic. The aggregated capital and surplus of these banks amounts to $1,451,296,366.05 and the deposits in these banks amount to $4,176,873,717.48.

The depositors, whose aggregated deposits reach the enormous figure that I have just given, select their banks for depositing their money and agree with the banks upon the terms and conditions upon which those deposits are made. I am opposed, Mr. President, on principle to giving the man who deposits his money in the bank of his choice any other guaranty for the return of his money than the one he makes himself when he becomes the creditor of the bank by depositing his money; and in principle, so far as he is concerned, I can see no difference in this attempt to protect him by providing that the Government will guarantee the return of that money from the Government guaranteeing the return of money that he loans a farmer when he takes a mortgage upon the land of the farmer for a return of his deposit with the farmer. In principle, so far as this individual is concerned, there is no difference in the two cases.

This idea that a man who parts with his money must have a guardian in the Government of the United States—or in the State, as some of the Senators have argued, with the State banks to insure a return on the contract that he makes when he makes his deposit—is rank socialism. It destroys all individual responsibility in the depositor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Illinois pardon me? The Senator would not follow that argument out to its logical conclusion, because if he did he would abolish bank examiners and everybody else and let the depositor depend upon himself for the security of his deposit. The argument goes a little too far.

Mr. HOPKINS. It may to the Senator's mind, but it does not to mine.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think it does to many.

Mr. HOPKINS. Men may differ on that; but to my mind it does not, and I will tell the Senator why it does not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will be glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. HOPKINS. Of course we have bank examiners, but we know there are different characters of banks, so far as the safety of the management is concerned, and it is left to the depositor which bank he will select. If you are about to make a deposit, you will inquire as to the character the bank has established in the community. If the president of the bank is a man who engages in speculation, a wild plunger, and you believe that the various bank officers gamble, you are not going to deposit your money in the bank, although it is subject to the inspection of the examiners sent out by the Comptroller.

The greatness and glory of our country is due to the individual efforts of its citizens and the responsibility that each assumes for his conduct in life. The stronger that individuality is developed in the citizen the surer he is of making a success in any undertaking in which he engages. That individual responsibility which is assumed and exercised by the citizen is an American characteristic. Our people are bold and aggressive, self-confident, and self-sustaining. The young man who leaves his paternal home and starts to seek his fortune for himself never thinks of depending upon others or upon his Government for his career. He marks that out for himself and realizes that his success is measured by the individual efforts that he puts forth. If he has the ambition of the average American boy, he is sure to meet with success in whatever calling he engages. Take that feeling from him and he simply becomes a machine; destroy that principle and you take the first step in making a nation of slaves instead of having a nation of freemen.

Now, I hold, Mr. President, that a man who has accumulated money more than is necessary for his daily needs and desires to make some arrangement for the protection of his surplus capital should be put in a position where he should exercise judgment and discretion of his own; that he must look ahead and see if the men to whom he loans the money, if the money is to be loaned, are financially responsible, so that the loan will be returned when the note that is given to evidence it matures; that if he invests it in any industry he should use judgment and discretion to see whether that industry is to be a going concern or is about to collapse financially; and if he desires to place it in a bank, as many prefer to do, and receive interest upon his deposit, that he must exercise that same discretion and judgment with respect to the bank that he selects to make this deposit. He enters into a contract with the bank precisely as he enters into a contract with the farmer if he loans him the money, or the manufacturer if he loans it to a manufacturer, or uses it in any other commercial way.

We should not forget in the discussion of this problem that these banks where these deposits are made are commercial banks; that they are organized primarily for the purpose of making money for the incorporators and the stockholders, and that this money is received by the bank for the purpose of being used by it in a commercial way to make money for the stockholders. If the man is foolish enough to put his money in a bank that engages in high finance, let him take the responsibility under the law with the men with whom he deals, precisely as he must take the consequences if he loans it to a manufacturing institution that is unable to repay him or to a farmer whose land is inadequate in value to repay principal and interest.

Then, again, Mr. President, this idea of guaranteeing the funds to the depositor at once destroys all differences that exist in the national banks of the country and places them upon a dead level so far as the return of the depositor's money is concerned. You put the Government of the United States in a position where every depositor in a national bank feels as he does in holding the note of a bank that that money will be returned to him by the Government of the United States if not by the bank, and by that one act you destroy everything that has been gained by the conservative, skillful, and far-sighted banker.

The depositor has no motive to search out the bank that is the most conservatively run; he has no motive to select the bank with the best capital and surplus; he has no motive to select the bank that makes the safest use of the funds that are deposited with it. Why should he? The Government of the United States has become his guardian. The Government of the United States will see that his $100 or his $1,000 or his $50,000, as the case may be, is returned to him with the interest that is guaranteed by the bank, if he deposits it with the first bank that he reaches on the street. It makes the butcher as good a banker as the man who has had a life training in the banking business. It makes the plunger at the head of a national bank as safe for all depositors as it does the most careful and prudent banker that has been developed in the banking business in this country.

Figures have been cited again and again during the discussion under the pending bill showing the small losses that depositors have sustained from the failure of national banks during the forty-odd years of our national banking existence, and arguments have been made from these figures to the effect that the burden upon the good banks will be light and that the losses will be still smaller if the depositors are guaranteed the return of their funds. Mr. President, I take an exactly opposite view. The reason that the losses have been so small is because the officers and stockholders of the banks are responsible to their depositors. The stockholders in electing their boards of directors have been careful to select men of banking experience, of conservative habits, and of broad financial views. These directors in selecting their president, vice-president, cashier, and other officers have endeavored to select the most skillful, the ablest, the most experienced men that this country affords, and it is because this spirit of rivalry which is bred from responsibility has brought about the splendid results that have been cited here again and again on the small losses that depositors have sustained from the national banks.

A man at the head of a great national bank like those in the city of Chicago or New York or any of our great cities not only feels the responsibility that he owes to his stockholders and directors and the depositors, but he takes a pride in showing to the people of the city in which his business is located and to the country that he is operating a bank upon the highest and best banking principles that are possible to be developed. He feels that he is making a reputation that will not only reflect credit upon the bank of which he is the head, but a record that will be of material benefit while he lives and a legacy to his children when he dies. Let the Government of the United States, as is proposed in these several amendments in one form or another, have the depositor's funds guaranteed and put the Government of the United States in a position where it will stand sponsor to the depositor for the safe return of that money. Put this banker that I have just described on the same level with the butcher who happens to be at the head of a national bank organized after this amendment shall become a law, and what incentive has he to develop the qualities of a great banker? What motive has he to establish the qualities of a great banker? None whatever. His object will be to make money for his bank, to take chances that he never would under other conditions, to become a plunger. If he is successful, big returns will come to him and those associated with him in the bank; if he fails, the Government will take care of the depositors who have furnished the money through their deposits to engage in his high finance.

There is another thought, Mr. President, in connection with this that I desire to call to the attention of Senators and of the country, and that is this: That national and other banks that are conservatively run and have been in existence for many years acquire a reputation that is of infinite value. That reputation becomes a part of the assets of the bank itself. I know in the city of Chicago there are banks whose stocks are selling all the way from 100 to 150 per cent above the par value of the stock and from 50 to 100 per cent above the book value of the stock.

Now, this 50 to 100 per cent above the book value is due to the reputation that the bank has acquired by its long conservative service in the city, and that much added value to the stockholders is assured to them by reason of the high-grade banking qualities that have always been exercised by the officers of the bank. You let the Government say to the depositors of a bank that has just started, and whose value of the stock is not above its book value—let the Government say to the depositors and to this bank that their deposits will be guaranteed to them by the Government, and it makes no difference which bank they go to, they are perfectly safe, and it will at once destroy the 50 or 100 per cent, as the case may be, of the stock value of the old and conservative and well-established bank, and bring it down to the actual book value. This is an injustice to every stockholder of the old, conservative bank.

Again, the bank with a large capital and large surplus will have to bear an unequal burden under all of these various amendments that have been offered with the smaller bank if the Government by any method guarantees the depositors, and the tendency will be that if these amendments should be adopted and become the law, the banks, instead of increasing their capital stock and attempting to increase their surplus, will reduce their capitalization and in a great measure hamper and retard the commercial business of the country. The trade conditions have so changed within the last twenty years that business would be very much hampered and retarded if our national banks with a large capitalization and large surplus were to reduce the capitalization, as the tendency would be for them to reduce if these amendments or any of them that look to the Government in any form guaranteeing the depositors, should become the law.

Again, Mr. President, a large part of the deposits are simply matters of credit. If a man goes to the bank and gives his individual note for $5,000, he is given a credit at the bank for that amount, if he does not desire to take the money away with him. The bank may take his unsecured note. Is it not a manifest absurdity to say that where he makes a contract with the bank of that character, that not only the bank should be responsible to him but the Government also, for the $5,000 that he leaves to check against in the bank?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. First of all, I do not want to be understood by any question I may ask as indicating my position on the bill, as against the bill or for the bill or anything else. I have listened with the greatest interest to these speeches, and particularly to the speech of the Senator from Illinois, which is a model of lucidity and information. He has spoken about the high reputation of the banks in New York, in which I concur. I suppose the city of Chicago is perhaps the second or third largest in the country in banking. Merely for information, I would be glad to know how the larger banks in Chicago stand in reference to this bill. That is brought to my mind by the fact that the Senator referred to one of the largest banks there.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not know a bank in Chicago or Illinois that favors guaranteeing deposits.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I mean to say the main bill itself.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is a division of sentiment there. The president of the First National Bank favors another kind of legislation than this. He favors the central-bank system, but Mr. Dawes, who, in my judgment, is one of the ablest bankers there is, not only in Chicago, but in the country——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I agree with the Senator——

Mr. HOPKINS. Says this is the best legislation it is possible for Congress to provide, and that he approves of it in general and in all its details.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HOPKINS. I do.

Mr. SMITH. Does not the banker, to whom the Senator refers, go even further than the Senator has indicated? If I understood the communication, which has been generally published from Mr. Forgan, who is recognized as one of the most prominent bankers in the West——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He is the president of the First National.

Mr. KEAN. He has a plan of his own.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will permit me, if I understand the attitude of Mr. Forgan, he has not only a plan of his own, but it is in direct antagonism to the railroad and municipal features of this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have the Senator from Illinois yield to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me, I do not want to interrupt him long enough to have it read, but I should like to have printed in the RECORD the article of Mr. Forgan on the Aldrich bill, opposing it and opposing the guaranteeing of deposits. I should like to put it in as a part of the literature.

Mr. HOPKINS. You can put it in, but not as a part of my speech.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will you let me put it in as an appendix to your speech——

Mr. HOPKINS. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. As showing how thoroughly you are in accord with your dear friend Mr. Forgan.

Mr. HOPKINS. It may be that the Senator's action as a Senator is based upon his personal relations with his constituents. I am acting for the public, and if in my judgment legislation of this kind will benefit the 85,000,000 people in this country, I shall stand for it regardless of whether one or more of my constituents happen to oppose it. I believe that the concensus of opinion among the 85,000,000 people is better than the judgment of one man.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me——

Mr. HOPKINS. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois yields to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. The great banks of the great cities of the United States are fortunately or unfortunately opposed to this bill. Whether Mr. Forgan's opinion is any better than that of the Senator from South Carolina I do not know. I know that the committee have prepared and presented a bill which they believe to be in the interest of the people of this country. Whether Mr. Forgan, or any other banker, opposes it or not is of itself a matter of indifference to me, nor does it affect my judgment. I take it for granted that the Senator from South Carolina in proposing to publish this statement in the RECORD is not vouching either for its wisdom or the accuracy of its statements.

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly not; I was merely illuminating the situation, as I supposed, by bringing in the views of one of the most distinguished banking constituents of the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. ALDRICH. I am a little surprised that the Senator from South Carolina should be appearing here now as the advocate and representative of the bankers of the country.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not posing as anything. I am trying to bring in his criticism.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I desire to proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield further.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will get this in right after the Senator gets through, if I am allowed to.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have no objection to the Senator from South Carolina putting that into the RECORD, or having it bound and carrying it around with him by day and by night. That is a matter of absolute indifference to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I decline to be interrupted in the course of my discussion by an irrelevant matter like that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let me say a word.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish the Senator would let me go on.

When I was interrupted I was discussing the matter of the deposits in national banks.

John J. Knox, in his work entitled "History of Banking," has recorded the sharp methods that were adopted by so-called "bankers" under the guaranty of depositors as practiced in the State of New York. The law looking to the guaranteeing of the depositors was safeguarded in all reasonable ways, but experience taught the people of that State that such legislation was fundamentally wrong, and it resulted in the end in disaster, as it would result in disaster from the national standpoint if it should be adopted as a part of the principle of our national banking legislation.

I have thus far, Mr. President, spoken only of national banks. What would be the effect of legislation of this kind on State banks, savings banks, private banks, and loan and trust companies doing a banking business? There are at the present time in this country 1,141 private banks with a capitalization, including surplus, of $32,467,401; 794 loan and trust companies doing a banking business whose capitalization, including surplus, aggregates $645,432,749; 1,415 savings banks with a capitalization, including surplus, of $235,444,984; and there are 9,967 State banks with a capitalization, including surplus, of $664,250,498. In other words, there is a banking capital in this country, outside of national banks, of $1,577,595,632. These banks have deposits that aggregate $8,776,755,207. Here are 13,317 banks with a capitalization greater than all of the national banks combined that would not be affected by the amendments that are suggested to become a part of the proposed bill. It stands to reason, Mr. President, that if the Government guarantees depositors in national banks, it would have an immediate and serious effect upon all of these State, private, and savings banks. If the theory advanced by the friends and advocates of the Government guaranteeing depositors in all national banks be correct, it would drive the $8,776,755,207, now deposited with these banks, into the national banks or into other channels of trade and would very seriously curtail the banking facilities in all of the States and Territories.

The figures that I have here given show clearly that the national banks hold but little over half in the way of deposits that are held by State, private, and savings banks and loan and trust companies, and that the national banks in number are only a little over one-half the number of these other classes of banks I have just named.

It is impossible to forecast with any degree of accuracy what the result will be upon the commerce and trade of the country to create the conditions in our banking system that the adoption of these proposed amendments, guaranteeing depositors in national banks, would produce. It certainly would unsettle business in a marked degree, and that would very materially affect all trade and commerce.

The advocates of the Government guaranteeing deposits in all national banks say that the States would be compelled to guarantee deposits in all State banks. Will these same advocates go far enough to say that depositors should have their deposits guaranteed in private banks or in loan and trust companies or even in savings banks? These deposits in these three classes of banks aggregate a larger sum than the aggregated deposits in all of the 6,625 national banks. There are $151,072,225 deposited in private banks in this country; $2,061,623,035 deposited in loan and trust companies, and there are $3,495,410,087 deposited in savings banks. Certainly no State would undertake to guarantee depositors in any one of the three classes of banks that I have just named.

I doubt very much, Mr. President, if the conservative States would be willing to follow the example of Oklahoma and through their legislatures pass laws to guarantee to the depositors the $3,068,649,860 that are deposited in the State banks in the various States in the Republic. The question of following the example of Oklahoma was recently presented by the governor of Kansas to a legislature convened in extra session for the purpose of considering, among others, this very subject. The level-headed, honest-minded, and far seeing men of that State opposed the unsound scheme that is a part of the laws of Oklahoma, and adjourned the legislature without passing any laws guaranteeing depositors in State banks.

In my judgment, the example of Kansas will be followed by the various State legislatures in this country, rather than the example of the legislature of Oklahoma, and that the more this question is discussed and the more thoroughly it is understood by the people the stronger will be the sentiment against giving a man who makes a contract with a private or State bank, or a national bank, advantages and privileges that are denied to another citizen who makes his contract with a farmer, a merchant, a manufacturer, or a person engaged in any kind of business.

There is no more reason why a man should be guaranteed the return of his funds, that he places under contract with a State or national bank, than there is that a person should be guaranteed a good crop return who makes his investments in planting his crops, hoping that the season will bring forth a bountiful return. The man that deposits his money in the bank under a contract should himself assume whatever hazard there is in getting that money back, precisely as the farmer has to assume the hazard of the expense and time and labor that he is put to in planting and sowing his crop in the spring, hoping for the return in midsummer or fall. The elements may be against him and he may get little or no return for his investment. Nobody is so wild as to contend that the Government should insure him that the elements will be so favorable as to give him a fair return on his investment. Why should the man who has a surplus, with which he can make a contract with the bank and deposit that surplus, be made a ward of the Government to the extent of having his investment returned to him?

Mr. President, these proposed amendments can not be defended either on reason or precedent. They are dangerous in that they lead to the rankest kind of socialism. They are in opposition to the fundamental principles of our constitutional form of government. From a banking standpoint they are rank heresy.

It is contended, however, by the advocates of these amendments to guarantee depositors in all national banks that they will provide against financial panics and insure against a run by the depositors on the banks. It seems to me that he who advocates that guaranteeing deposits will provide against financial panics has read the financial history of his country to little purpose and has paid but little attention to the principles of political economy that in the last analysis govern and control all these questions.

Financial panics are not produced by depositors withdrawing their funds from banks, either State or national. The action of depositors in withdrawing their funds from a bank is only one of the evidences that a financial panic is already upon the community or the country. Financial stringency and, indeed, panics are incident to all commercial countries. They are an inevitable part of the commercial history of every civilized nation. That they have been more frequent in this country than others is due to the fact that we have developed more rapidly in population, in industries, and commerce and trade than any other civilized country. We have had periods of wonderful growth and development in an industrial and commercial way and have periods of stagnation and depression, due to causes entirely other than those relating to banks or currency. Indeed, Mr. President, I think the candid student of the financial and industrial history of this country will say that the panics of 1837, 1857, 1873, and 1893 were due more to industrial causes and to legislation of an industrial character than to any other causes. You might as well say that a man can throw himself over a high board fence by pulling at his boot straps as to say that guaranteeing the depositors a return of their money by the Government will prevent financial and industrial panics in the future.

I doubt, Mr. President, if legislation can wholly prevent a panic. It can mitigate its hardships. It can temper the storm, but it can not reduce conditions to that dead level that will guarantee to the American people that they never again shall see a recurrence in some form or other of the experiences that we have had at stated periods during the history of our country. All the currency that there is in this country forms but a very small percentage of the circulating instrumentalities that are used in carrying on the commerce and trade of the country. I think I am safe in saying that the aggregated currency of this country would not exceed 5 or 6 per cent of the instrumentalities that are used in our trade and commerce. From 93 to 97 per cent of the business is conducted by means of checks, drafts, bills of exchange, and promissory notes.

In considering this subject we should not confound capital with credit. Capital represents money and tangible property. Credit represents a loan of capital, and that credit of necessity is multiplied many fold in the checks, drafts, bills of exchange, and promissory notes. Whenever that credit system reaches a point where the owner of the capital doubts the ability of the debtor to make good, then the initial period has been reached that, if not tided over, may lead to a financial storm.

While the wealth of our country in the last ten years has increased enormously, the truth is that it has not kept pace with the credit that has been given on this capital, and the money of the country has not increased in the proportion that the business of the country has increased. So that by reason of that fact more credit has had to be extended and a larger volume of business has had to be done on the credit system than safe banking would warrant.

In 1898 the circulation per capita of money in this country was $25, in round numbers. In 1906 it was $32, and that has been advanced in the arguments under the pending bill as a reason why there is plenty of money in this country if it could be kept in circulation. The truth is, Mr. President, that while the money in circulation has been increased per capita from $25 to $32 the business of the country has increased many fold more than the increase in the currency. In 1898 twenty-seven eastern cities reported their clearings as equaling, in round numbers, $52,000,000,000. The same cities in 1906 reported clearings of business to the amount of $126,000,000,000. This shows that for this period there was an increase in the business equal to 122 per cent, or more than four times as great as the increase in the money circulation.

For many causes which are unnecessary for me to explain on this occasion, even if I could, this increase of the credit system created apprehension in the minds of the financiers of the country, and when they undertook to curtail the volume of business that was daily transacted in the various cities of this country, by refusing loans at the banks and calling in some of those that had already been made, conditions were produced that led ultimately to the failure of some of the more poorly managed banks in New York City and drove the others to shut their doors and resort to clearing-house certificates in order to protect the financial integrity of the banking system of this country.

Now, this, in my judgment, Mr. President, would have happened had every depositor in every State and national bank been guaranteed the return of his money. When the banks of New York closed their doors to their customers and refused currency to their correspondents throughout the Middle West and the South and the great West, there had been no run upon any of the great banks in Boston, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Baltimore, Chicago, or any of the western cities. It had been limited to a few banks in New York City, and, indeed, the great and well-established banks like the First National Bank and the National City Bank, the Hanover Bank and the Chase Bank and others, had no calls from individual depositors that would have disturbed the banking conditions of any of those banks. But with the credit system impaired to the extent that checks, drafts, bills of exchange, and promissory notes could no longer carry on the business of the country, or 95 per cent of it, the result was inevitable that we should have a financial panic. That condition was controlled by the banks issuing clearing-house certificates and by the prompt and patriotic action of the Secretary of the Treasury. And whenever, Mr. President, a similar condition arises in this country where the credit portion of the instrumentalities by which the business of the country is carried on is impaired, it will produce like results regardless of the question as to whether the deposits in the banks are guaranteed to the depositors or not.

Runs on banks by depositors occur only when the depositors get into a hysterical and abnormal condition of mind. When any man who has deposited his funds in a bank can reason calmly and clearly on the situation that confronts him he will not help to make a throng of depositors who fight and scramble at the bank's doors to get into the bank and demand their money.

The instances are very few, indeed, since the establishment of our national-bank system that would warrant a run upon a national bank. Indeed, where the bank is managed within the limits of the law, no occasion can arise that would warrant a run upon the bank, and yet we do know that from time to time such scenes have been enacted and that banks have been compelled to shut their doors because of the unreasoning clamor of depositors for the immediate payment of their money. Whenever a condition arises in a community where there is a State or national bank that leads the depositors to believe that their funds are not safe in the bank, they will not stop to think that the Government will ultimately pay them if the bank does not, but each depositor will seek to reach the bank's doors before other depositors and withdraw whatever money he has in the bank for immediate use.

Depositors all recognize that while the Government, under the policy advocated by those who favor guaranteeing the depositor's funds in the bank, will ultimately pay them, they must wait some time before they can receive the money from the Government. Every man who becomes so hysterical or abnormal mentally as to desire the return of his money gets in a condition where he can not reason correctly on this questions, and will demand the immediate return of his money, even if he were sure that by waiting three days the Government would turn it over to him.

Many banks that receive deposits make a contract with the depositor that they shall have thirty or sixty and some ninety days after a demand for the return of the money is made before the money can be paid over. Such a bank, where a run is made upon it, finds the most clamorous depositors are those who have contracts of these time limits. That time limit has no influence with the depositors whatever. They simply go there in this hysterical state of mind and demand their money as they would go to the bank and demand it if it was guaranteed by the Government.

Guaranteeing by the Government private depositors is not only fundamentally wrong, considered from every standpoint, both financial and economical, but it would not produce the results that are contended for by the advocates of such a system. I feel sure that the more Senators reflect upon this subject the less inclined they will be to adopt this heresy—I can call it no less—and make it a part of the banking laws of our country.

It seems to me, Mr. President, without taking any further time, that the wise and the sensible thing for the American Congress to do is to enact this bill into law and provide the banks with this $500,000,000 of additional emergency currency. That, in my judgment, will do more to stop panics of the character we have just passed through than anything which can be advanced by any other kind of legislation that has been proposed.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to have a little article read and put in the RECORD.

Mr. WARREN. I am going to call up a bill from the Calendar.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will put it in when you call it up. Get up the bill if you want to.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to call up the bill (S. 4030) to fix the pay of the Army.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CURTIS. I have an amendment pertaining to that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to taking up the bill, but I want to submit the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, of course under our admirable system of rules here we have always found that we can discuss any question we please on any bill pending regardless of the association of ideas or the connection between the two. I do not intend to discuss the financial situation on the Army bill, but having been refused a moment ago the privilege of inserting in the RECORD a very interesting and illuminating document, I ask that it be read from the desk now for the information of the Senate, beginning at the cross mark and ending at the cross mark.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR HOPKINS: I have your favor of 7th inclosing a copy of Mr. ALDRICH'S bill to amend the national banking laws, of which you desire my opinion. It seems to me the national-bank act itself might with good reason have been entitled "An act to provide an artificial market for Government bonds," and that this proposed amendment might with equally good reason be entitled "An act to provide an artificial market for municipal and railroad bonds." I can imagine no other motive for its enactment than an attempt to enhance the value of the bonds referred to, but I am doubtful if ultimately it would be effective in accomplishing even that, because I do not believe the banks will avail themselves of it, and it will become a dead letter.

No bank, from the standpoint of its credit in its own community, could individually afford to avail itself of the privilege of taking out circulation at a cost of at least 7 per cent (in addition to the 6 per cent tax there would, of course, be the ordinary expense of printing, transportation, redeeming, etc.). If it ever should be used it would have to be on the united action of the banks in a particular clearing-house association or community. I would even be doubtful if any reserve clearing-house association outside of New York City would care to take it out without the cooperation of all the reserve cities in the same section of the country. The taking out of such a currency would be notice to each community using it that an emergency exists, and the public would act as they always have and always will act whenever it becomes generally known that an emergency exists. They would start to withdraw their money from the banks and hoard it.

But a more important and more radical objection is that the use of it would cripple the national banks (which are 99 per cent commercial banks) in their ability to accommodate their commercial customers. In order to get the necessary bonds to pledge as collateral security for it they must before getting it invest at least 133 cents for every dollar of it they take out. Whereas, if instead of investing in such bonds they should loan their money direct to their commercial borrowers it is self-evident they would have 33 per cent of the amount invested available for such loans.

Further, it is a fact that national banks do not invest except to a very small extent in such bonds. As a rule, they can not afford to and, being commercial banks, they naturally use their money for the direct benefit of their commercial customers. I have the honor to preside over the largest bank outside of New York City. We carry as an investment a very small amount of such bonds. When the recent currency stringency struck us we took out $3,000,000 of additional circulation and received on deposit some of the money distributed by the Government for the benefit of the general situation, but as shown in our statement we had to borrow nearly all the bonds used by us for that purpose.

Other banks did likewise, as this was the only basis on which we could afford to use them. It cost us an average of 2 per cent to borrow them. This is what the national banks would invariably have to do before they could avail themselves of such a currency, and it would add to the expense of the circulation this additional 2 per cent, making its use cost 9 per cent.

In a money stringency, with its shattering of public confidence and curtailment of credit, in what condition would the banks be to help their customers if they themselves are obliged to borrow currency at 9 per cent? They might do something to help speculation in Wall street, where alone money reaches such exorbitant rates. They could do nothing for the support of their commercial customers.

The principle of the proposed legislation is directly the reverse of what it should be. Something should be done to avoid emergencies and to enable banks to tide their customers over periods of depression. This can not be done by issuing emergency currency, the very name of which is enough to breed a panic, nor by exorbitantly taxing the banks in the exercise of their legitimate functions.

There are many other matters in connection with this currency question involving economic principles which are as immutable as the laws of nature, and which are directly opposed to the method of providing a circulating medium proposed in the bill, but I have not time at present to go into a complete discussion of these questions.

I should like to show that the currency so issued is absolutely without the element of elasticity in any possible meaning of the word. No currency can be elastic that is issued to the banks before it is issued by the banks, as no such currency can possibly adjust itself in the volume of its circulation to the actual daily requirements for it in commerce.

Elasticity is the daily adjustment of the volume of the circulating medium between the banks that issue it and the public that uses it. There can be no such adjustment in connection with the currency proposed. The circulation, arbitrarily fixed in volume, of a secured currency is one principal cause now of the periodical panics which occur in this country, and to add such an emergency currency as is proposed, similarly secured, seems to me to be an operation not unlike the bringing of a drunken man full of whisky a dose of brandy to sober him. This illustrates, from my point of view, just what the effect on the financial condition of the country will be by injecting or attempting to inject into the currency a circulating medium such as is proposed. It would aggravate any condition of emergency existing instead of correcting it, and the use of it would produce an emergency, even when none existed.

You also ask me if I am opposed to the Government guaranteeing bank deposits and if I will give you my reasons therefor. I am very decidedly opposed to such a proposition, and my reason is that if the Government is going to guarantee the deposits of all the banks, it completely eliminates the necessity of the public discriminating between one bank and another. The old established bank with a record of many years of conservative management and accumulated strength would become just the same in the eyes of the public as a bank in the hands of speculators or incompetent or dishonest managers—

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not know how long this communication is. I suggest that it may be printed without being read.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is nearly finished.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is nearly 2 o'clock. I suggest that it be printed without being further read. I presume the Senator from South Carolina will be satisfied with that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not think the Senator from Rhode Island ought to have the only say, without allowing me to say anything.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly not.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will have it read, or I can read it myself whenever anything else comes up.

Mr. ALDRICH. I certainly would not interfere with any of the friends of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. These are not my friends.

Mr. ALDRICH. But I suggest that the rest of the paper may be put in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely want to point out the inconsistency of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the Senator from Wyoming desires to proceed to the consideration of the Army pay bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Please let the reading be finished now. It has got back into its native water of finance. It was entirely apart from the Army pay bill, but I could not help myself.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is prepared to go on with his speech on the unfinished business, and I think that is quite as important to the Senate as the reading.

Mr. TILLMAN. That may be; but I think it is very important that this paper shall go in, and I intend that it shall get in in my own way. The Senator from Rhode Island need not undertake to dictate to me what I shall do. He can do that on the other side of the Chamber, but, thank God, this side is not ruled by him.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, having the floor a short time ago on the Army pay bill, I was glad to yield to the Senator from South Carolina to insert what he desired in the RECORD. I hope that his insistence is not going to throw over this bill, which I desire very much, for several reasons, to dispose of to-day.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not in the least. It has already gone over. The Senator from Rhode Island can give away by asking that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am quite willing that the bill suggested by the Senator from Wyoming should be taken up, provided the debate is not too long. I think in justice to the Senator from Idaho, who has been waiting for some time to make his speech, and who wants to make it this afternoon, he should not be delayed for any considerable length of time.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the suggestion made by the Senator from Rhode Island, and I should deem it a courtesy on the part of the Senator from Idaho if he will allow us to go on. If the bill leads to extensive debate, I shall be willing to let it go over and permit the Senator to go on with his speech.

Mr. ALDRICH. If it leads to debate, I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. WARREN. I say limited debate, not extended debate. I am willing to leave it in the hands of the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. DEPEW. Before that is put, I simply want to give notice that on Friday, the 6th, I will address the Senate on the financial bill, immediately after the morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks that——

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand that the Senator from Rhode Island has made a request that the unfinished business be laid aside? I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then the Senator from Idaho will go ahead with his speech.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am on the floor already.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the Senator from Idaho upon the unfinished business.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will ask the courtesy of the Senator from Idaho to allow the reading of the article to be concluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I understand it is very short.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is very little of it left.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield for the purpose of finishing the reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the paper, as follows:

Ultimately the banks honestly managed would have to pay for the escapades of the dishonestly managed banks, and there would be no merit in excelling in conservatism or ability in management. It would be introducing into the banking business of the country the grossest error that now exists in connection with labor unions. It would reduce all bankers to the same level, and there would be absolutely no reason why anyone should not drop into the first bank he came to to deposit his money.

The Government being responsible for the deposits puts all on an equality and makes all equally good. Besides this, I think it would be practically socialism for the Government to undertake the guaranteeing of the enormous deposits in the banks. The stockholders of the banks supply the capital, and under the law are liable for double the amount of the capital subscribed. They have been accustomed to get for supplying this guaranty to depositors all the profits that can be made in the business.

Why the Government should similarly guarantee deposits, even if the banks are taxed for it without getting the profits in the business, I can not see. If the Government is going into the banking business to the extent of guaranteeing all the deposits, it had better go into it direct and make all the profits that can be made out of it.

I have had to hurriedly dictate these opinions, and they are probably not as clearly or as well expressed as I would like to express them had I more time at my disposal, but I think they will indicate to you my conclusions and to some extent at least the reasoning which has led me to them.

Very truly, yours, JAMES B. FORGAN.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, with the indulgence of the Senator from Idaho, I will take just a moment. I just want a little time to comment. I will not consume more than a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to say, Mr. President, this man Forgan is president of the First National Bank of Chicago, with a capital of $8,000,000, a surplus of $6,000,000, and deposits amounting to $97,500,000.

I want to say further that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], who objected to this letter going in, as I recall, something over a year ago, when I introduced a resolution calling upon the Committee on Finance to investigate the transactions of the Chicago clearing house in connection with the Walsh banks and the Walsh bank failure—Mr. Forgan, as the head of the clearing-house association, had taken certain action in that failure which I regarded as unwarranted and unlawful—the Senator from Illinois bore witness then in a most eloquent and impassioned way to the financial skill, wisdom, and ability of Mr. Forgan and his associates. My efforts to strengthen the banking law at that time were rendered futile by the action of those who are in control here. Mr. Walsh has been convicted of various crimes against the law in connection with the running of his bank, and the Senator from Illinois is to that extent discredited as——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from South Carolina will wait for the presence of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Illinois knew this was coming up. I gave him notice. I am not attacking him at all. I have no feeling in the matter, and I do not see why I should not say what I want to say. I am not going to be discourteous to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. ALDRICH. The language of the Senator from South Carolina seemed to be more or less in the nature of——

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply said the Senator from Illinois was discredited in his attitude then as compared with his attitude now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will not indulge in that kind of language in the absence of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I yield to the superior wisdom and discretion of my distinguished friend from Rhode Island, and will say nothing more about that. I simply call attention to the fact, however, which I hope is entirely proper, that the language of Mr. Forgan in regard to this being "practical socialism" was considered so wise by the Senator from Illinois that he used the same phrase to-day in his own speech and indorsed that part of this letter.

Now, I am not concerned about this little racket between the high financiers of this country, my friend from Rhode Island, and my friend from Illinois, and the banker in Chicago. They disagree about how this disease shall be cured. I am only concerned that we shall get some legislation here, if we have any at all, that will not increase facilities for stock gambling in New York, that will not enable the New York bankers, under this or any other scheme which we shall evolve here, to draw on the Treasury for currency under one scheme or another and then levy tribute upon the South and West in the way of charging additional interest when we might be allowed under some safe and honest plan to get the currency direct to our own States without having to go through by New York and pay toll. That is all I am after.

I want to say further, I entirely disagree with the idea of asset currency, which is the basis of the argument made by Mr. Forgan.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho allow me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to thank the Senator from Idaho for his courtesy, and I hope I may have the opportunity sometime to reciprocate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am glad to have yielded to the Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator in charge of this bill has not yet indicated to the Senate when he expects to have a vote on it, but assuming that he hopes or expects to take that vote next week, in order that no other Senator may be inconvenienced by the arrangement, I desire to say that on Monday at 2 o'clock——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator allow me a minute?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I was not in the Senate when the Senator from South Carolina was making some remarks, but if there is anything of a personal character, I would like to know the nature of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I disclaim any personal allusions to the Senator from Illinois. I was simply saying that in the discussion had something over a year ago about the action of the Chicago clearing house taking over the assets of the bankrupt Walsh banks I had commented on the conditions there, and the Senator from Illinois vouched for the wisdom and prudence of this very man Forgan and his associates, and that he now occupies a different attitude. There was nothing in the world to give offense to the Senator had he been present, I hope. I intended no offense.

Mr. HOPKINS. Of course I was not in the Senate Chamber while the Senator was speaking. If there was anything of a personal character said by him, of course I wanted to know what it was, so as to know what my reply would be. I accept the Senator's statement.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator can get the record from the reporter if he desires.

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, no; not at all. I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that my respect for Mr. Forgan, of the First National Bank, is not diminished at all from what I entertained for him and his good will.

Mr. TILLMAN. Only loss of faith in his wisdom now.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have not lost faith in his wisdom; not at all. In the management of the banks there a year ago—in the interests of the banks of Chicago—he showed great judgment and great discretion and great patriotism, and I have nothing to take back or modify regarding what I then said of him.

But that I do not happen to agree with him on the question we are now discussing is no reflection upon him, and I trust it is not upon me.

Mr. TILLMAN. Not necessarily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Texas asked me a question which I wish to answer.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand the Senator from Rhode Island desires to reply to the Senator from Texas, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Texas, I think, was not in the Chamber yesterday when I said that it had been my purpose to ask the Senate to fix a time for taking the vote, but that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] had asked me to defer that request until he was able to have some idea about his own health, as he desires to make a speech on the bill. He is not now in a condition to make it, but he expects to be early next week. I think it will be quite proper for the Senator from Texas to speak on Monday. I hope to be able to get a vote by Wednesday of next week. The minute I hear from the Senator from Wisconsin, I certainly shall ask the Senate to fix a time for the vote. I think that the general discussion of the bill is practically exhausted, or will be after two or three other speeches are made.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply desire so far as possible to get out of the way of the other Senators, so that there will be no conflict as between them when they intend to speak, and thus avoid any possible conflict of that kind.

With the consent of the Senate, unless some other important business shall render it undesirable, I will address the Senate on Monday next at 2 o'clock.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to give notice.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, if the Senator from Wyoming will permit, I desire to withdraw the objection I raised to having the unfinished business laid aside.

Mr. WARREN. It is too late to make a withdrawal of that kind; the floor has been surrendered; but I wish to say that the bill which I endeavored to call up is the second one on the Calendar. It has been on the Calendar now some six weeks or more, and I have laid it aside from day to day to accommodate different Senators. I believe that I have been courteous to Senators, as I always mean to be; but I feel it my duty not to put off longer the consideration of this important measure, but simply wish to now give notice that I shall call up the bill at the first opportunity and endeavor to stand upon my rights as a Senator, and upon the rights of the bill in the position it occupies.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, when Congress enters upon the consideration of providing for a currency or controlling the money of the country it enters upon one of the most important of its functions. It is more ofter better that Congress should not enter at all upon the consideration of the question. This is such an occasion. I am not prepared to admit for a moment that it is necessary or wise at this time to enact any legislation along the lines proposed by the bill under consideration. It seems to me too much like prescribing for a person who has been sick, but has recovered from the sickness. The conditions that suggested this legislation have entirely passed away.

The bill under consideration is said to be a provision for emergency currency. That presupposes the existence of unusual conditions demanding relief through legislation. Because those conditions existed or may have existed during the months of October, November, December, January, or even February, it does not follow that they exist now; and the fact is that the money conditions of the country to-day do not call for any legislation whatever. So far as I see the situation, the best thing we can do is not to enact any law looking to a change in the financial policy of the Government at this time. It can accomplish no good purpose, and it may result in very pronounced evil.

Mr. President, the difficulty that existed during the months of October, November, and December arose from the fact that the financial table had been tilted; that the financial ship had been thrown upon its beam end, and the compartments that are intended to maintain the equilibrum in the distribution of the money of the country had been broken down. There never was a time in our history, as has been frequently stated during the discussion of this measure, when there was so large a per capita of money in circulation in this country; and had the equal distribution of the money been maintained, there would have been no panic. A few days after the financial condition culminated in the declaration that was sent out from the New York banks about the 18th day of October, it was very evident to the people all over the country that New York intended to hold on to all of the money that was in the possession of the banks in that city in diregard of the rights and the contracts under the law which they held with banks in other portions of the country and that they did not intend that the banks outside of New York City should have the benefit to be derived from the use of their money which was held in the New York banks. That was evident.

I began to receive communications from banks throughout the West, and especially in the Northwest, complaining that the reserves which they had held in the New York reserve banks, and upon which they relied for their solvency, were being withheld and denied them. In view of that condition, on the 8th of November last, after having had some conversation with the President in regard to the situation, I addressed a communication to him, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., November 8, 1907.

To the President:

On behalf of the people of the Western States, and especially those of the Northwestern States, I would urge that no further deposits of money from the Treasury of the United States be made in New York banks except upon the condition that such banks shall immediately make available in money to the banks in such Western States the full amount of the reserves held by such New York banks on account of such western banks.

The tying up of many millions of dollars of western money, representing the reserves of the western banks held by the New York banks, must inevitably result in empowering the New York banks to determine the time and conditions of the free resumption of banking functions by the western banks, whereas if the reserves of the western banks could be converted into available money at once, the financial situation of the West would be free from domination on the part of the East, and the West would become a valuable ally to the East in the restoration of desirable financial conditions rather than remain as at present—a fellow-sufferer.

Yours, truly, W. B. HEYBURN.

That expresses the condition as I see it in the light of all the time which has intervened just as accurately as it expressed it at that time, on the 8th day of November.

In response to that statement it has been stated that certain action was taken, under the direction of the President, which resulted in a better distribution of the deposits of the Government's money in national banks. However that may be, certain it is that, after the 8th day of November, there was no very considerable deposit of Government money made in the banks of New York City; that there was a better or more even or equitable distribution of the Government money.

The newspapers of the country from one shore to the other took up the suggestion contained in the letter, which was sent out through the Associated Press, and it met with universal approval and commendation from one end of the country to the other. From almost every State in the Union there were sent to me copies of newspapers stating their approval of this righteous demand made for fair play between the banks of New York and the banks for which the New York banks held reserves.

Mr. President, it has been stated that the financial stringency arose from the insufficiency of money in the country. Therefore it was demanded that our currency should be made more elastic—a term that has absolutely no meaning that is applicable to the condition. An elastic currency may be any condition that you choose to imagine. It was not elasticity that the currency lacked; it was activity. What we wanted was an active currency, one that would be doing business, as was suggested on yesterday by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. The ordinary function of money is not confined to one transaction per day. A single dollar may perform the functions of many dollars every day or every hour, but if it is held by the first man who obtains possession of it, and is thus withdrawn from the performance of any further function as money during that day, then it is limited to the function of a single dollar. But if it is made the basis of twenty transactions in a day, then $1 is as good as $20, so far as the transaction of business is concerned.

Mr. President, a panacea for this supposed evil is proposed in the bill under consideration. The issuance of money is purely a government function. It is as much a part of the legitimate functions of the Government as any other that the Government performs. The national-bank note, based upon a deposit of the Government bond, is issued by the Government of the United States; it is issued to the national bank; but it is issued by the Government of the United States pursuant to the laws of the United States. It states upon its face that it is secured by a deposit of the bonds of the United States. That is a statement which is contained upon the Government's side of the national-bank note of to-day. The Government of the United States stands behind its bonds, and the bonds are as good as the Government, and the notes that are issued upon the face of the bonds are as good as the bonds or the Government.

We have about exhausted the possibilities for the issuance of that class of notes, because we have about covered the entire issue of Government bonds. There is a margin of about $175,000,000 between the total issue of bonds and the issue of national-bank notes—I deal in round figures only—so that it would not be possible to enlarge the issue of national-bank notes to any great extent based upon a deposit of Government bonds. It is therefore evident that if the Government is to issue more money in the shape of currency, it must be based either upon the faith and the credit of the Government itself, without any specific deposit of securities, or it must go outside of Government securities.

Mr. President, the Finance Committee were brought face to face with this proposition. By the terms of this bill they propose, first, that the circulation may be based upon government bonds in the sense that all State and municipal securities or bonds are government bonds. Of course they are, strictly speaking, government bonds, because they have government behind them; they have behind them the taxing power that maintains them, that provides for their redemption, that provides for the payment of the interest upon them, and they are within the legitimate sphere and scope of bonds that may be used as a basis of circulation.

But how do we stand in regard to such bonds? There are not enough State bonds in existence to afford a basis for the proposed issue of $500,000,000 in national-bank notes. There are only $227,500,000 in State bonds in the United States, and they are to a very large extent already placed and performing the functions peculiar to themselves elsewhere, and would not be obtainable as the basis for circulation, except at an exorbitant price. Probably it would not be possible to obtain one-fourth of the total issue of State bonds now in existence for the purpose of basing an additional circulation upon them.

Mr. President, the free $175,000,000 of Government bonds could not be included under this bill, because it does not contemplate the issue of a dollar of currency based upon bonds of the Government of the United States. It provides only for an issue based upon State, county, and municipal bonds and upon railroad bonds, and, inasmuch as the State and county bonds are already so engaged that they would not be available, it would mean an issue of currency based entirely upon railroad bonds. It would be necessary, under the terms of this proposed act, to recite on the face of each national-bank note that it was secured by the deposit of railroad bonds; in other words, it would be necessary under the terms of this bill to recite the character of the bonds that were deposited as the basis of the circulation. So that we would have in circulation a new class of money, with no Government behind it, with no taxing power behind it, with no governmental power for the enforcement of the obligation of the contract behind it.

We would have behind the circulation bonds that were at the mercy of a board of directors, sitting not in public, but in the back room of a bank or of a railroad company's office, determining by their individual votes and according to their individual will the destiny and the control of the railroad's affairs which would mean the destiny and control of the railroad's bonds. We would have a circulation based on railroad bonds over which we could exercise no control whatever. We could exercise no legislative control over them; we could not legislate in such a way as to compel the board of directors of a railroad company to make provision to pay the interest on the bonds; we could not provide by legislation that the board of directors of the railroad company should maintain the road or make provision for betterments; we could not provide that the railroad company, acting through its board of directors, should perform any act looking to the maintenance of the integrity of the investment or of the bonds. There is not a single element or trace of Government or governmental control behind the railroad bonds.

Therefore I repeat that we would have an entirely new and distinct class of currency from any that has ever existed in this or any other country. We would call it money, and it would be issued by the Government of the United States on the account of the banks applying for the same, under the provisions of this bill. But it might be issued on the account of the railroad company itself, because they could loan the bonds to the bank. Under the provisions of this act it is not provided that the banks shall own the bonds that it deposits as the basis of circulation. It may borrow them. It may borrow them of the railroad company under a contract that the circulation shall issue and be delivered to the bank, and the bank may hand it over to the railroad company, and the railroad company may be benefited by the issuance of a circulating medium based upon its own bonds. It would then owe the bonds; it would then owe the circulation based upon the bonds, and the Government would stand behind the circulation to the extent that the Government is liable under the provisions of this bill. If a railroad company issued $300,000 of bonds and $100,000 of those bonds were used as a basis of circulation and $200,000 of those bonds were in general circulation, if they defaulted upon the interest of the bonds, then, Mr. President, the majority of the bondholders might go into court and procure a receiver for the railroad company. They might institute proceedings of foreclosure, as has been done in many cases in this country, to sell the property of the railroad company, which would render worthless the $100,000 of bonds that were behind the issue that the Government had made; and what would remain behind the issue, except the bank itself and the Government of the United States? The issue would be unsecured and totally unprotected, because the railroad would have been sold under the foreclosure proceedings.

That is not a strained conception. Many times in the recollection of every Senator present railroads have been foreclosed in that way, their bonds have been rendered worthless, and the property has been passed to others, leaving absolutely unprotected and unprovided for the bondholders under the original organization.

But, without going into details at all, the great evil is that there is no government behind railroad bonds; there is no taxing power behind them, and no money should be based upon anything that does not have behind it the power to tax for its maintenance and the preservation of its integrity.

Mr. President, I have listened with much interest to the many discussions of this question of the deposit of railroad bonds, but I have not heard any Senator yet who has undertaken to enumerate the railroad bonds that would be available as a basis of circulation under the provisions of this bill. I have scanned closely the history of railroad bonds for the last thirty years, and I heard the statement made here this morning that under no conditions had such bonds ever fluctuated more than 25 per cent. Why, Mr. President, I have in my mind a number of cases—and I could name them, but I do not desire to be invidious in speaking of these railroad corporations—where the entire first-mortgage bonds were wiped out by foreclosure proceedings and rendered utterly valueless.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BORAH in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if the bonds which he has reference to were bonds such as are provided for in this bill, issued by a company not only paying the interest upon the bond itself, but also paying for five years 4 per cent dividend on its stock? Was there ever such a bond as that so wiped out?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, Mr. President; I saw the bonds of one of the greatest railroad systems in the United States swept from par to nothing inside of two years.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not exactly the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not exactly the point to which the question applied. It was this: Had that railroad paid 4 per cent dividend on the stock of the road for five years?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I might answer that in the affirmative, and I might be led away here into an analysis of a number of railroad corporations and their affairs that would divert me from the brief remarks that I intend to submit upon this general question. I desire to come right back to it and carry the mind of the Senator from Utah with me. My objection does not make it necessary to go into details as to the solvency of the history or the financial record of the railroad companies at all. My objection is that railroad bonds have no element of government in them or behind them, and that money should not be based upon anything that is not supported by Government, carrying with it the right of taxation.

I do not object to State bonds or county bonds or municipal bonds with a sufficient basis of taxable property behind them, because by a vote of the people, in the exercise of the principles of government, adequate provision can be made for the redemption of the bonds and the payment of the interest. That is not true of railroad bonds, and we can not make it true by legislation. What will happen——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, what will happen if this bill becomes a law? What will happen if there is $100,000 of the bonds of the railroad behind the circulation and the railroad defaults in the interest? Will the Government, nothwithstanding the fact that the notes issued upon those bonds state on their face that the bonds of the railroad are deposited as a basis for the issue, allow it to go without giving attention to the fact that the railroad, whose bond has been pledged as security for that issue, has defaulted in its interest? If it will not let it go, what will it do? Will the Government pay the interest on those bonds? Suppose it is repeated time and time again, what would become of the security behind the national-bank note?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say, in answer to the Senator, that the Government never will see a time when it would have to foreclose on those bonds, nor would it be necessary for it to foreclose on them.

Mr. HEYBURN. I must interrupt the Senator, because that is again an unintentional attempt to lead me from the real principle that is under consideration. I am not going to be drawn into a consideration of details that will never be reached. I am just as capable in the field of prophecy as another, and another is as capable as I am. I am not going to rely upon any prophecy. I am only going to look the matter square in the face, and I say that if the Government did not step forward and pay the interest that is in default upon those bonds it would militate against the value of the security that was behind the circulation, and we would then have one series of national-bank notes based upon securities that were in default and in bad repute and another series of bank notes based upon securities that were in good repute, and we would be back to the old days when I was a boy, when we had to have a bank-note detector on every desk in order to determine whether or not the current money that we took in each day was good money or bad money. That would be the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not have any desire whatever of withdrawing the Senator's mind from the line of argument he was pursuing. My object in asking the first question was this: The Senator made a statement, in answer to a statement made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS], to the effect that at no time in the history of this country were bonds such as are provided for in this bill ever known to fluctuate or to lose in value more than 25 per cent. I myself then asked the question whether there could be found in our history any record of a bond that had gone from $100 to nothing when the corporation issuing that bond had paid dividends of 4 per cent on its capital stock for five years? I do not want to pursue the matter further. I will not say anything more now, except to add that I do not know of such a bond or such a railroad.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is not necessary to go into such infinite details and refinements in order to dispose of the question of the propriety of issuing circulation based upon railroad bonds, because if you did the argument would be protracted indefinitely and it would spread out into infinite lines of thought which would never reach a focus.

It is sufficient to me that railroad bonds have no governmental powers behind them to preclude them in my judgment as a basis of circulation. I do not need to go into the history of railroads or railroad finances. The Government should be behind the money of the country, and it would not be behind money based upon railroad bonds. That is my reason. That is the reason why I shall not support any measure which proposes to base the circulation upon railroad bonds, I care not how good they are, I care not how good they might ever be, or what their record or history may be. It is not a proper basis for the circulation of money.

Mr. President, there are minor objections to this bill, but those two are the principal ones, and either one of them is in itself sufficient to make it impossible for me to support such a measure. I can not give my support to a measure that does not adequately provide for the proper retention of the reserves by the banks that own them.

I am not at all in sympathy with existing law that allows what they call "country banks" to be treated like country boys. The money in the country banks that belongs to the people is entitled to exactly the same status under the law as the money that belongs to those who live in the large cities. It is their money. I speak for the depositors in the banks who are the owners of the money. They are the ones I am seeking to protect by whatever responsible action I may be called upon to take here. I am giving very little thought to the protection of the banker. He will protect himself. He is using the money of the individual who owns it, and presumably using his own capital.

I have taken some pains to ascertain the general method by which subscriptions to the capital stock of national banks have been paid in. I find that the instances in which currency or money has been paid for the capital stock of national banks are very few. Ordinarily it is a question of the exchange of credits. A number of men will come together for the purpose of organizing a national bank. They will give their check or draft against a credit which they have in some other institution. The currency or the coin is not brought and placed in the vaults of the new bank. There are $900,000,000 represented by the paid-up capital of national banks. I give it in round figures. It is nearly a thousand millions, but it is safe to say that out of the thousand millions of dollars of paid-up capital of national banks there was not $1,000,000 of it in either coin or currency which went into the vaults of the bank. It is merely an exchange of credit. The credit is good. I am not attacking that. But I am speaking of the question of the convenience of money.

The most important item of money in this country is that which the people carry in their pockets. The people hold more money in their pockets and tills to-day than there is in all the national banks in cash. There is not less than a thousand million dollars in the pockets of the American people to-day, and many of our financiers have stated since this panic was on that there were fifteen hundred million dollars in the pockets and tills of the people. That is a conservative estimate. That money is not affected, so far as its safety is concerned, by any legislation or conditions brought about by legislation. That is the ten or fifteen or twenty dollars that the man who owns the money carries about with him or keeps under his immediate control.

There is in addition to that what we will call a thousand million dollars, although it is much more, which is accounted for in the vaults of the banks, held as reserves against individual deposits amounting to between twelve and thirteen thousand million dollars. If those reserves were maintained in actual money, I have heard it stated on this floor since this discussion began, it would result in a withdrawal of money from activity. That is not a fact. Under our bank-reserve law the money that is held as reserves is just as available to the depositor as any other money. The reserve law was passed for the purpose of setting aside a fund to be always at the command of the depositor. The only restriction is against loans. A bank may pay out without regard to the question whether or not it has the reserves required by law in its vaults. There is no limitation. It may pay out to the last dollar to its depositors. But it may not loan money when its reserves are below 15 or 25 per cent, as the case may be.

A few years ago an ingenious plan was devised in certain money centers to enable them to obtain the use of the reserves held by what are called "country banks." It is first provided that the country banks shall withdraw from use 15 per cent, and then it is provided that those banks may deposit three-fifths of that in the central-reserve banks. Of course the very fact that they may do it is taken into consideration when the temptation of interest is considered, and the money centers say at once, "These country banks have so many hundreds of millions of dollars held as reserves. They are authorized under the law to deposit in central-reserve cities three-fifths of that sum." They immediately open negotiations, and they say to the country banks, "We will pay you so much per cent for the use of this money," and the country banks deposit their reserves in the central-reserve banks. New York City held more than $240,000,000 of country-bank reserves on the 7th day of November last, under a contract that they might use it.

Now, where is the safety in the reserve of the country banks if some other bank may use it without limitation? The New York banks held that proportion of the country banks' reserves without the restrictions contained in law which prohibits the country banks from using it for loans and discounts. It may not be used, forsooth, by the country banks for loans and discounts in the vicinity where the money belongs, but by sending it somewhere else it may be used for that purpose. So, as a matter of fact, the bank reserves of lawful money have been a fiction, so far as three-fifths of the reserves of the country banks are concerned, and so far as concerns the reserves of the central reserve banks of New York, Chicago, and St. Louis. If you will examine the statement they sent out in response to the call of the Comptroller, which statement is dated the 3d of December, you will find that they were not carrying any reserves, as a matter of fact, against the reserves of other cities. They were not carrying anything in the nature of lawful money reserves for the purpose of protecting the deposit of reserves of other cities. You have only to analyze the bank statement to make that manifest.

I cite this not for the purpose of entering into a harsh criticism of banking methods, but to illustrate the absolute insufficiency of existing legislation for the protection of deposits of individuals in banks, because that is the primary consideration before us. We are not here to protect the banks. They can protect themselves. We are here to protect the people whose money is deposited in the banks. A man with $10,000 to his credit in bank has probably depending upon the preservation and integrity of that $10,000 a hundred thousand dollars of private business, a hundred thousand dollars of property that is absolutely at the mercy of the $10,000 which he has to his credit in the bank. If he loses the $10,000, he will lose not only the $10,000, but he will lose the property protected by the ownership of the $10,000 either in money or credit.

So I say we ought to keep in the very front of our consideration the depositors, because they represent, I think, something like 20,000,000 of the people of the United States in some one or the other of the banks. Only a little less than half the people are depositors in some class of banks in the United States.

Mr. President, the first step demanding our consideration is the rebuilding of the compartment in this financial ship, so that it shall not, when it is thrown upon its beam ends, send its cargo to one end or the other; so that the table can not be tilted and the money thrown to one end of the country.

Out of $67,000,000 deposited out of the Treasury of the United States in national banks during this crisis less than three millions of it—yes, less than two million and a half—went west of the Missouri River. They would not have needed it had it not been that their reserves were sequestered by the New York banks. No one in the section of the United States from which I come dreamed that there would be any necessity for the issuance of any substitute for money for circulation until after New York City, on the 18th day of October, notified them that hereafter they could not expect to have the use of their own money which was held in New York.

I am not going to enter upon a tirade or arraignment of stock gambling, but I want to say in passing that there should be some law which would prevent the selling of that which a man does not own. That is the evil of stock gambling. You may call it gambling; that name will describe it as well as another. That is where the difficulty arose in New York which brought about the crisis of the 18th day of October. It was that men were selling what they did not own, and they were borrowing and putting up margins to represent the difference between the price they had sold at and the price of the market. I do not intend to enter into any detailed analysis of stock gambling, but I think every Senator understands the general principles upon which these fictitious transactions are made and the vast sums of money that are absorbed in such transactions. The money that should have been available in the banks of New York City to make good their lawful contracts and the outside reserves which they held had been loaned at the high rates of interest which prevailed to these speculators in order to hold their contracts against loss or against the day of settlement. It was stated here, and it has been stated in the New York financial journals, that there was on the 1st day of December more than $350,000,000 tied up in stock speculation at that time in an attempt to sustain the market. That is a large sum of money to withdraw from activity.

I refer to the suggestion I made—that it is not elasticity we want; it is activity in circulation. It makes no difference what security is behind the money if the money is dormant. When the country is doing $40,000,000 of business upon a cash capital of $4,000,000,000 it makes no difference what security is behind it. If four thousand millions of money enters into twenty transactions in a day it can do eighty thousand millions of business in one day. But if you put it behind a single transaction—I do not care what collateral is behind it—the market is starving for the want of an active currency. An active currency can only be brought about by business conditions.

Did you ever see a pettish child crying for something because it thought that by crying for it it could get it, but when you made it plain to the child that it could not have it its face would be wreathed in smiles and it would go about its play? That is the situation to-day in the business world. When these men who deal in money, who buy and sell money, and who have made a habit of it, had so wound themselves up in their transactions that they must have money, on any desperate chance, they set up a plea to Congress "to give us an elastic currency" or "to give us more currency." They did it without any thought of the result or of the effect upon other people. They said, "If we appeal to Congress for an inflated currency or an additional volume of circulation, and Congress gives it to us, we must surely reap some benefit from it;" and they based their plans upon it. But we should say to them as we say to the child, "Quit crying for that. You are not going to get it. Go about your business and settle down." They will do it. The business world has done it.

The Government is withdrawing its deposits from the national banks, and yesterday's papers stated responsibly that one bank or a number of banks had sent back to the Government something over $3,000,000 of Government money which the Government had on deposit, simply because the banks did not need it. It does not make any difference whether it is a New York bank or not. It is indicative of the revival of a healthy financial condition. That is all.

There is money enough. Whatever legislation is needed is not in the interest of making more money. If you will just glance at the figures you will find that in ten years there has been added to the volume of money in this country more than $900,000,000—the natural growth of money. We buy $200,000,000 a year in gold which is placed in the Treasury of the United States and circulating notes issued against it. It was $197,000,000 last year. I have the figures from the Director of the Mint here. I will not enter into the detailed figures, but I state in round numbers what it is. In ten years the gold that we acquired through the ordinary channels of trade amounts to a thousand million dollars at the very least. Ten years such as the last year and it will amount to two thousand million dollars. That is the natural growth of the volume of money in this country. It is quite sufficient, because it is quite commensurate with the growth of business. If you will take the figures representing the growth in the volume of business of this country and set them against the growth in the volume of money, you will find that the equilibrium has been maintained at all times, making allowance for the fact that a large community needs more money in proportion to the small, because business is conducted on a larger scale.

But with the natural increase in ten years of $900,000,000 in the volume of money of the country—I have the detailed figures on my desk and can verify the statement—what is there to complain of? The country is not starving for money. Keep it in the right hands, protect it against the evils that I have spoken of, and the volume of money is sufficient, and let us just dismiss this question of financial legislation from our minds and go about other legislative concerns. Let the business world understand that it must not enter upon these spasms and tantrums of finance with the expectation that it will be afforded any relief at all, and it will soon cease to put itself in the position where relief is needed or where those people think it is.

With a great country of production, with farm products of such phenomenal volume as are produced by this country every year, it is absolutely impossible for this country to be wanting in prosperity. The money that we receive for last year's wheat and last year's crops of various kinds is enough when the year is balanced up to insure a balance of trade in our favor, which means that we will receive more money than we pay out. That is all that the balance of trade means. When it is against us it is because we have spent more than we have earned or paid out more than we have taken in. When it is in our favor we have taken in more than we have paid out, and that is the normal and natural condition.

We took in $60,000,000 of gold during the very worst of this panic, representing the balance of the margin of profit to those who owned commodities. It is commodities that count in this country. The money is the mere token representing the transfer of the commodity from one to another. As long as we have the commodity and the market we can command the money. During this panic the volume of circulation increased something like $190,000,000 inside of two months.

Mr. President, there is only available as the basis of circulation proposed by this bill $227,500,000 of State bonds, were we to take it for granted that they could all be obtained. You can not obtain a hundred million of them by any inducement any man would offer for them.

I desire to address myself to a proposition submitted here this morning with reference to the retirement of the money after it has been issued. When this issue is delivered by the Government to the banks upon the basis of railroad securities and it goes out in the ordinary course of business through the banks into the hands of the individuals, of what effect is an order from the Comptroller of the Currency that the money be retired? How is it going to be executed, is a question that suggests itself to my mind. It is easy enough to say you are going to retire so many millions a month.

But how any particular issue? Suppose an individual has $100,000 of the issue in a safe-deposit vault. What power or what law can compel him to bring it in and surrender it, at the risk of forfeiting it, in the event of his failure to do so? No. The bank comes in and says, "We desire to retire $100,000 of this emergency currency," and they bring what? They bring lawful money, legal tender, and they pay it into the Treasury of the United States, and they reduce the volume of legal-tender money of the United States to the extent of $100,000, because the law provides that it must be destroyed when it is surrendered; and they take up what? They take up these railroad bonds. You have therefore withdrawn from circulation $100,000 of the legal tender of the country in order that they may take up the railroad bonds which represent not that legal tender, but $75,000 of national-bank notes that are in somebody's safe-deposit vault and that will stay there and will be as good one hundred years from now as they are to-day.

How are you going to compel the retirement of that money? Suppose $500,000,000 is issued, as provided by this bill, and an order goes forth that the five hundred million is to be retired. Suppose that money is so engaged that it is earning more than the tax upon it, taking into consideration the interest which the bonds bear, which diminishes the burden of taxation to that extent. That money is in circulation, and the Government says "this money shall be retired." What is the practice? They do not retire the identical money, because they can not get their hands on it. They retire an equivalent in value. That is what they do to-day. There are national-bank notes in circulation to-day representing the identical issue that has been withdrawn for years; but other notes were withdrawn in lieu of them.

Let us see how that would work here, with this new element in our currency, with a national-bank note that says on its face

"This note is secured by a deposit of railroad bonds." That is what it must say. Let us see. I happen to have a national-bank note in my pocket. I call your attention to what it says on its face, because these are practical questions. I looked at it to-day with a good deal of care. Here is a national-bank note of the Union National Bank, of Pittsburg, Pa.; and it says on its face "Secured by United States bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States of America."

Now, there is the statement on that note. You have $500,000,000 of these notes, and some of them would say, "Secured by first mortgage bonds of the New York Central Railroad Company."

Mr. KEAN. That is not on the notes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Suppose it is not. Its absence speaks as loud as its presence. What difference? It distinguishes it from the class of notes that are secured by United States bonds, upon which it is printed. It makes no difference at all. You would read it on to the face of the note. If you did not find it there, you would read the other on to it.

Suppose the bank issuing this circulation upon railroad securities undertakes to retire it. For convenience of comparison, we will say it undertakes to retire the whole issue—the $500,000,000 based upon railroad securities—and they do not come in. Somebody has them. It is beyond the control of either the Comptroller or the bank through whose doors they passed out. The party is entitled to the bonds by presenting to the Treasury of the United States lawful money, and in certain contingencies under this bill he is entitled to them by presenting to the United States Treasury national-bank notes of another bank. What is the result? You have withdrawn from circulation $500,000,000 of money other than that which is based upon railroad bonds.

You have withdrawn from circulation $500,000,000 of money that is based upon bonds of the Government of the United States, because under the provisions of this bill he is given the absolute right to recover the possession of the bonds he has deposited by surrendering any class of money included in this bill. Is that safe legislation or a safe financial policy? It would result, on the first turn of the wheel, under the circumstances I have suggested, in substituting a currency based entirely upon railroad bonds for the existing currency based upon Government bonds, because there are only about six hundred and some odd million dollars based on Government bonds; and as those bonds mature and are retired, unless we run further into debt and issue new bonds, that volume must be a constantly decreasing one. We have increased the issue based on Government bonds in ten years $400,000,000, in round figures. I took the statement which was given us by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] when he opened the discussion upon this bill, and I was surprised at the increase in the volume of national-bank notes in ten years in this country. Of course the volume had fluctuated, or rather it has grown with the growth of business, and it has been limited only by the scarcity of Government bonds.

Those are the arguments that appeal to me against opening the door to the issuance of a circulation based upon railroad bonds. I can not give it my support. I must oppose it. There is no question of politics at all about it except as politics means government; that is all. Never can I vote for any financial measure that undertakes to issue circulation upon any security that has not behind it the taxing power incident to government. The United States Supreme Court could not compel the directors of a railroad company whose bonds were behind the circulation to make certain tariff rates or to make such business arrangements as would guarantee the payment of the interest on the bonds. If the railroad companies did not pay them, the Government of the United States would be asked to pay.

It has been suggested that there was reserved in this bill the power to compel the substitution of other bonds. How would you do it? Theoretically, it sounds well. You say that the Comptroller of the Currency might say "the bonds have deteriorated in value and you must put up other bonds." Suppose they did not do it?

Do we want to legislate along lines that anticipate bankruptcy to our banks and that impose conditions which must inevitably bring the banks face to face with bankruptcy? I think not.

Of course, they would close up the bank, and they would close it up because the security that the bank had deposited behind the issue that had gone out to the people was worth less than the money that had been based upon it. That would be the only reason why they would close up the bank. Where would they leave the holders of the notes? Where and how would it affect the value and the integrity of the issue based upon bonds that had deteriorated to such an extent that the Government felt compelled to call upon the banks to substitute other bonds for it?

We must meet all these possible contingencies in considering a question of this kind. Suppose that a circulation had been based upon railroad securities and the securities had fallen 50 per cent in value. Suppose they fell in a day because of some great calamity and the destruction of their property in a wholesale way, and the Comptroller would say to them the next day, "You must deposit other bonds in lieu of those railroad bonds, because of the catastrophe they are not worth 50 cents on the dollar," and suppose the parties say, "Well, we have no other bonds; we have no money."

Mr. KEAN. May I ask the Senator from Idaho a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KEAN. What does the Senator from Idaho consider the first liability of a bank?

Mr. HEYBURN. The first liability of a bank, if it is a national bank, is to redeem its currency.

Mr. KEAN. It is to its note holders.

Mr. HEYBURN. To redeem its currency. The bank does not issue the bank note. I have heard that question considered here from various standpoints. The primary issue is by the Government of the United States. It prints the note and delivers it, subject to a contingency, to the bank. Of course when the bank has made the contingency good, then it relates back to the original delivery by the Government. Then, what does a national-bank note say on its face? I will be pardoned if I exhibit this bill. It is a small one, but it is the text of this legislation just the same. That is the little piece of paper about which we are legislating in this Aldrich bill. It does not say that the bank stands good for this note. It says it is "secured by United States bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States." What does that mean? The United States is the guarantor of that note, and if the bank does not pay the United States does. So the United States is primarily the responsible factor behind the note.

Now, I desire to finish the simile. Overnight the value of the bonds has been reduced 50 per cent. In the morning the Comptroller says: "Make good and deposit other bonds in lieu of these." The bank says: "We will not do it," or "We can not do it." It is immaterial which. What does the Comptroller do? He closes up the bank. The notes will be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States. How is the United States to be recouped? First, out of the bonds it holds. They will recoup it to the extent of 50 cents on the dollar. It was suggested here yesterday that the Government was the preferred creditor against the deposits in a bank. There is no law making it so. You can not enact a law that would make it so. It is not competent for Congress to take the title to the money of the depositor, who is not a party to the contract either directly or by implication, and make it responsible for the debt of another.

They take possession of the bank for what purpose? They take possession of the bank for the purpose of distributing its assets according to the legal rights of the parties. But the United States Government can not determine the legal rights of the parties. They are fixed by law. There is no debt due to the United States on account of the circulation beyond the security. Congress undertook to so legislate that the United States would be protected by the deposit of the bonds, and it required the deposit of the Government's own bonds. The Government can cancel its bonds, and when the Government bond is canceled it is paid dollar for dollar.

But now it is proposed to substitute something for which the Government is not responsible—a railroad bond. It is proposed to substitute a railroad bond for which the Government is not responsible and in relation to which the Government stands exactly where an individual would stand. So I state what such legislation makes possible; and what is possible in government is probable always in the estimation of a careful legislator. The probabilities are not weighed except in the light of possibility. This legislation, I say, makes it possible for the Government to find itself in a position where it must redeem the circulation of a bankrupt national bank, and I place no limit upon the extent of the bankruptcy.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Government in this bill pledges itself to redeem its notes as it has already pledged itself to redeem all other bank notes. The Government is responsible for every bank note that is issued. The American public in handling bank notes do not look to the bank, but to the Government, for the solvency of the note.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is right. The only question that then remains is, What should the Government look to where there is not sufficient guaranty to the Government? The guaranty of the Government is obvious, and it is provided for in the bill, but where is the guaranty to the Government in this case? That is the question I am considering now.

Mr. TELLER. It is an important fact that we issue only 75 per cent on a certain class of bonds and 90 per cent on another; and the Secretary can always, if there is a shrinkage in bonds, call for more securities at once. If a bank should fail to respond, the bank would go into liquidation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have just been considering that question. That is one of the most unfortunate features of it. The Government may call for other securities, and the bank may not be able to respond, or it may not be willing to respond, and the bank then has the only alternative of going into bankruptcy. When the bank goes into bankruptcy its depositors suffer, and the Government suffers, both by loss and by delay. So it is the credit of the banking system that makes such a condition possible.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to say another word?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator is making an attack upon the railroad bonds as not being good security?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say to the Senator if he will examine into the history of these bonds he will find that even in the great panic recently, which I have heard declared on this floor to be the greatest of all panics, that class of railroad bonds have never gone down to 75 per cent of their face value yet, and probably never will.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this was not a great panic. It was just a little nightmare, that is all. There was no real harm done; that is, along big lines. It was a lesson, and lessons sometimes are healthy. We have all learned lessons sometimes, and paid for them, and found out afterwards they were pretty good purchases.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Colorado was not in the Chamber, perhaps, when I said that my objection to the railroad bonds as a basis of circulation was based not upon the consideration of their value at all. I have considered that incidentally.

Mr. TELLER. I just came in. I have been in committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. My objection is based on the fact that there is no Government behind that class of securities carrying with it taxing powers for their protection and maintenance. That is a wider and a larger principle of objection than the other. The other is a question of detail that would vary with conditions and time. The principle is elemental. If the Government is the proper agency through which our money should be issued, then the issuing of money is a governmental function.

Mr. TELLER. I think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. And I think the Government should act only on a responsibility that is within its control. It can not control the responsibility of a private corporation, because it does not sit in counsel in the board of directors. It has no advising or controlling function in the management of a private corporation, in a State government, county government, or municipal government of any kind.

The courts can compel the levy of taxes and the collection of them and the application of the fund. The courts are a part of the Government, and the counties and the States are a part of the General Government of the United States. They are subdivisions of it, and they are all subject to the control of the courts and the law. That is a safe foundation. A national-bank note can as consistently and appropriately be based upon the bonds of a municipality as upon the bonds of the General Government. It may be a question of advisability, of judgment, but as to the question of right they stand one on a par with the other. But for the benefit of those who were not present I repeat that my objection to railroad bonds is that they carry with them no taxing power and there is no Government function behind them.

Mr. President, I hope that more consideration will be given to this phase of the question—the question of the propriety of the Government of the United States—that without going into an analysis of railroad bonds and management and relative prices and the effect of panics upon them, consideration will be given to this great legal governmental proposition of the propriety of the Government issuing circulation upon something over which it can exercise no governmental control.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] struck a keynote when he suggested the possible effect of this. It brings the Government too close to these corporations. It makes too many things possible. It makes too many things probable. With the Government standing close in its relations to this class of corporations, when times are hard and exigencies press upon men, they are apt to crowd the limits of their power and overstep the boundaries of prudence, and do it because they may do it, and when they may do it you can rest assured that they will do it if necessity impels them to do it.

Can Congress in the exercise of its high functions of Government place it within the reach of these men to do these things that obviously would threaten the prosperity of the people?

I say again that whatever I have said to-day on this question has been from the standpoint, not of a bank director, not of the Treasury of the United States, but from the standpoint of the owners of the money. Every dollar of this money is owned by the depositors.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Idaho has just repeated what he stated a few moments since, and it surprised me very much. I always feel a good deal of hesitation in questioning any legal statement the Senator may make, but I do not understand when a depositor places his money in the bank that that is his money after it gets into the bank. I understand that the relation of the debtor and creditor is created by that act of deposit, and that the banker then owes to the depositor the amount of money the depositor has left with him.

While I am on my feet I should like to ask another question, because it is in direct connection with this one. I understood the Senator to state that in case of the insolvency of a bank the United States would have no claim prior to the claim of the other creditors of the bank upon this fund, which may have been raised by the depositors. My recollection is that since the year 1797, under a general statute which has been expounded frequently by the courts, in every case of the insolvency of an individual, trustee or otherwise, where there is an indebtedness due the United States, the United States has a prior claim for the full amount of its claim over and above any other creditor. If I am not correct in that I should like to be corrected.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will first consider the first proposition suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania. The question of ownership is one of varying quality in law. We speak of the measure of ownership. That, perhaps, expresses it better. A depositor places his money with a bank, subject to his own orders, under an implied contract that the bank may use it, but always subject to the right of the depositor. The relation of debtor and creditor that is thus established is not the ordinary relation of debtor and creditor, but results from commercial transactions of contract. It is not that relation; it is not that quality of debtor and creditor; it is one peculiar to the nature of a bank note. A creditor of the depositor may attach it, not as the money of the bank, but he may attach the money of the depositor in that bank. If he has it to his credit the attachment is good. The bank can not come in and offset, except in a very limited scope, its claims on that money, even against the depositor.

The courts have varied in their conclusions in regard to that question; but the final result of the decisions is that the creditor, the depositor, has a superior right to the credit of the bank to that money. What does that mean? It means that the relation that exists between the depositor and the bank is not strictly that of debtor and creditor, but the depositor has such an interest in that money as that it may be taken as his money, or rather as his credit. It is not a question of taking it as the money of the bank held in trust for the depositor so long as it is a free deposit not subject to obligations. That is the line the courts have drawn. I think that answers the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not follow that there is but one ironclad definition to be given to the term "ownership." There is quite a latitude in the measure of ownership or the quality of it. Now, I will hear the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, by practice and by law, when a man deposits his money in a bank, it becomes the money of the bank and he becomes a creditor of the bank. He can not draw out that identical money, but he may draw out an amount equal to it, because that is the theory upon which bank deposits are made.

Mr. PERKINS. There is no segregation of the fund.

Mr. TELLER. There is no segregation of the fund. A bank owes the depositor so much money, which the bank by a custom is expected to pay to him, but not the identical money. If I should put in the bank a large amount of money to-day and the bank should burn up in twenty-four hours afterwards, I would not lose the money. The bank would lose the money; I would not. It becomes the absolute property of the bank, but the bank becomes a debtor.

Now, I will challenge the Senator to find anywhere any adjudication of a different rule from that. The bank does not become the trustee to hold the money. It may be possible sometimes to make such a deposit, but the ordinary deposits are not made in that way. I know of people having made deposits of money in banks which they put in an envelope and expected to draw it out, and then the bank becomes the trustee of that money.

Mr. HEYBURN. The custodian.

Mr. TELLER. The custodian. That is what you call a "special deposit." When I put my money in the bank without any limitation I become simply the creditor of the bank, and if the bank fails I lose my money.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not believe it would be possible that any serious difference should exist in opinion regarding the legal status of money deposited in the banks between myself and the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Colorado. I presume that in the rather long experience we have all of us had in the practice of law, oftentimes involving this question, we have had occasion to go to the bottom of it, as they say.

When I used the term "ownership" here I undertook to make my meaning plain. I said when I used it on the first occasion that I was not dealing with the question of technical ownership, but I was dealing with the ownership in that larger sense that goes to the morals of this question.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I owe obligations to the Senator from Colorado for even more clearly explaining the position I took than I did myself, but I want to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that he made that statement in conjunction with the statement that the depositors being the owners of the money the Government could not have a prior lien, or rather, that it did not have a prior lien, and it was not within the power of Congress to give it a prior lien, because it would be interfering in a relationship to which it had no relation itself.

Mr. HEYBURN. But I still think so.

Mr. KNOX. I will content myself by saying, with some reluctance, that I am absolutely convinced that the Senator is wrong on both propositions.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, if I were here for the purpose of settling a legal proposition necessary to be settled in the determination of this question, I would go with some care into the consideration of it, and doubtless succeed in making myself understood as to my intent in the use of the terms that I use. I know very well that in the discussion of a question of this kind under such circumstances one should be more careful in the use of terms if they are to be subjected to a critical legal analysis. I believe I know—I have been credited with knowing—the relation which the depositor bears to the bank, the quality and quantity of ownership, and the estate which he has in the fund which is held by the one on account of the other. I have frequently had occasion to litigate that kind of question to the last analysis, as has doubtless the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and many other Senators. I did not intend to enter upon a technical legal definition of the terms or the application of those terms.

I still say that the United States has no prior lien to the individual deposits, not because of conditions that might arise, but because of conditions that would arise under the conditions stated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] on yesterday. I was considering the relation of ownership in the light of the discussion of the Senator from Michigan, and I stated then—and in the sense that I stated it it is true—that the Government would not be a preferred creditor. That the Government might be a preferred creditor under some conditions can admit of no doubt, because the relation of a preferred creditor is one that depends upon peculiar conditions, and it is one that must arise upon a conferred right. You must have a right, and from that right the condition flows; but it was utterly immaterial to the consideration of the present question, except as applying to the remark of the Senator from Michigan, whether or not, technically speaking, from the standpoint from which the Senator from Pennsylvania discussed it, the absolute ownership of the money was in either party. The Government will have a prior lien only when it is given that right by law. There is no act of Congress to which my attention has been called that would give it a right under the national banking act, as a preferred creditor, to the funds of the bank, because of the depreciation of the security bond and the circulation which the Government was called upon to redeem. That condition was not contemplated, and did not exist at the time to which the Senator from Pennsylvania refers.

Mr. President, in regard to the relation of the depositor to his funds it is not necessary to consider the question as to whether or not he is entitled to the identical money. He is not. The money that is in the bank is to be considered in volume. The right is not to any particular note or integral part of the volume of the money, but it is the right to participate in the volume to the extent represented by the deposit of the individual.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I would say, to the extent of the obligation of the banker to himself and others. Suppose a man makes a deposit of $10,000; that the next day he borrows $10,000 of the bank and the bank fails; does he not have to come in precisely like any other creditor?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. He has no claim on that deposit, has he?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at all. If I said anything that looked as though I thought so, then I stated myself badly, because I am not in a position to plead ignorance of the law covering that subject; but that does not go to the question I was discussing. It is often the case that an adversary—the Senator from Pennsylvania will pardon me if I speak of him as an adversary even in debate—finds profit in sidetracking the main thoughts of his adversary and taking up an entirely different proposition.

Mr. KNOX. I do not regard the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. KNOX. I did not regard the Senator as an adversary in this matter, but as a friend who had gotten off the right track, and I tried to restore him to it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, I did not use the term "adversary" in any invidious sense, and I am quite sure the Senator from Pennsylvania understood me. He has succeeded only in diverting me for about fifteen minutes from the consideration of the question I was proceeding to consider—to the consideration of a technical expression in regard to the legal rights of the parties. From the standpoint from which I stated it, I stated it correctly; from the standpoint from which the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Colorado chose to consider it, they stated the law correctly. One is not necessarily to the exclusion of the other. I was speaking of money in a different sense and relation. When I speak of the ownership of it, I still say that I am justified by the facts and the law in speaking of the deposits in banks as the property of the depositors. If you chose to enter into a technical analysis of property, as to its quality and character and the contingencies under which it changes its quality and character, we might be led off into a most interesting dissertation upon the law, but one which would not be profitable in determining this question.

The depositors are the ones whose property not only is in the deposits, but whose property depends upon the maintenance of the credit which they have in the bank. The depositor has that property represented by a credit, if you please, at the bank, and upon that credit is based the ownership of perhaps ten times the amount of the credit. Perhaps I might better have used the term "credit" instead of "money," because neither the bank nor the depositor has the money. The bank has it in figures and the depositor has it in recognition. With less than four thousand million dollars in existence the banks hold, on the face of their statements, something like fourteen thousand million dollars. So they are both of them dealing in figures and credits. It is immaterial whether we use the phrase "owns the money," or whether we say "they own the credit," for it is credit. It is theirs, and I speak for the integrity and the protection of the credit of the depositors in the banks. Is that stated free from the legal objection of the Senator from Pennsylvania? It is their credit, and credit in this country is the thing upon which prosperity is based. Money is the convenient token representing the credit. The credit belongs to the depositor, and it is our business to see to it that it is protected. The reserves are transferred as credits. The currency is not always shipped from the bank to a reserve agent. The token is sent, whether it be a draft or otherwise. If the actual money required for reserves should be kept it would require, in round numbers, $900,000,000, to be held as reserves against the deposits in the national banks. That is about one-fourth of the actual money in the country.

Where is the money representing the capital stock of the national banks? How much of it is tangible? Does the bank loan it? The capital stock of the national banks is practically equal to the reserves required to be held by the national banks. What is the theory of banking? A number of men come together and say that "for the privilege of using the money of this community, we will organize a bank and pay up so much capital stock." The depositor, before doing business with the bank, says to himself, if not to some one else, "This bank has a paid-up capital of $500,000." He sees in his mind that it has that much capital that is available to make good any contract he may make with that bank. When he deposits his money in that bank he has in his mind the paid-up capital of the bank, which was in fact "paid up" in credit. There is $900,000,000 of that kind of money in the United States to-day that we are counting as assets. It is as intangible as was that two hundred and fifty-odd million dollars of reserves in New York City on the 18th day of last October. It is just about as available for the purpose of making good the contracts and obligations of the banks.

I think perhaps by being led into this discussion of details I have detracted from the value of the suggestion that railroad bonds are not an appropriate or proper basis of circulation because of the fact that they have no element of government in them or behind them. When I was called upon to arrive at a conclusion and form a judgment in this case as to the propriety of supporting a bill that contained a provision for the deposit of railroad bonds, I did not go beyond that single inquiry as to the propriety of the Government issuing money based upon something over which it had no control, and which had no taxing power behind it. I stopped right there and I said: "I will not support any financial measure that proposes to issue circulation based upon something that the Government is not behind."

No element of control that we have undertaken to exercise over railroads would put the Government behind a railroad bond, because the railroad's board of directors is the controlling element and not a legislature or a council or a Congress. Let us stop in this proposed legislation right where we are and content ourselves with legislation that will prevent the money from being improperly drawn from the banks in one section of the country for the use of banks in another section of the country. Let each community own and control its wealth as far as possible and we will have performed the highest mission and the best function of government at this time.

Mr. President, I had it in mind to go somewhat into detail on the question of the reserves, but I have already occupied more time than I had intended in discussing this question, and I will content myself at this time by saying that, in view of the fact that the emergency has passed away, nothing would be gained by providing for the issue of a currency of this kind, even if it were based upon national-bank notes.

It has been suggested that I take up the question of the process and effect of the foreclosure by the Government on railroad securities. Basing my objection upon the principle I have stated, it becomes unnecessary to go further into that question. If I were going to support this measure, then I would think that there should be some carefully considered plan that would limit and define and prescribe all those features pertaining to the realization by the Government upon these bonds in the event that the bank failed to make good or the railroad company failed to pay the interest on its bonds or the dividends on its stock or any other condition.

Looking at it from the broader standpoint, as I have already explained, it seems to me that it is not necessary or desirable to go into such details. Let us say to these—what shall I call them, financial jugglers? I do not desire to deal in harsh terms, and I am not going to inveigh against Wall street, or individuals who are prominent in banking circles, but let us say to these financial jugglers, and I will use that term for the want of a more apt phrase at this moment, "You are not to have more currency; the currency or the volume of currency in this country shall grow naturally out of the process of Government, augmented, as it will be, every year to the extent of not less than $100,000,000, sufficient to meet the growing and increasing business; you are not to have an emergency currency to tempt you to do that which you should not do; you are not to have an emergency currency that will quiet your conscience while you evade the law; you are not to have an emergency currency that will make good your defalcation, when you have unlawfully used the reserves which you are pledged to maintain; you are not to have an emergency or an elastic currency that shall be in keeping with your financial conscience; but you will keep within the letter of the law, and when reserves are intrusted to you, you will maintain those reserves as the law requires you shall."

When they understand that they will not run themselves into a cul-de-sac every year. I was told a year ago to-day, when this body passed the financial bill of the last session, that it would prevent panics. I opposed it. I did not believe that it was either necessary or wise. The act of March 4, 1907, one year ago to-day, was to avert such conditions as have been confronting us for the last three months. What was its effect? Its effect was just contrary to that which was prophesied for it. It accomplished no good purpose; it just greased the conscience of the financial jugglers. Having come to their relief once, they thought that by their misconduct they could compel us to come to their relief again. Congress did not come to their relief, but the Executive branch of the Government did, and gave them the use of $250,000,000 of the Government's money because it seemed, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said recently, to be necessary and wise. I will not enter into a consideration of that question.

The Government did come to their relief because it had the money; but suppose the Government had not possessed under its immediate control that sum of money, what would have been the result? Are we to play Government along the lines that we will have an abnormal reserve of ready cash against the day of want? There have been many times in the history of this country when the Secretary of the Treasury could not have come to the relief of the bankers in New York and deposit in one bank in one day $11,000,000 of the Government's money. I believe that is the amount that was deposited in one day during the recent panic. I have the figures on my desk, and I had intended to incorporate them into the RECORD; but, as I have said, I have already overrun my time. I will, however, just glance at those figures for a moment. They show that the First National Bank of New York received $10,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States in one day, and another bank, the National City Bank, on the same day, or within a day or two, also received $10,000,000.

They based upon that $20,000,000 a credit for philanthropists, statesmen, and salvators of their country, and everything that is grand and glorious. I even saw a newspaper that proposed to nominate the principal owner of one of those banks for President of the United States on the strength of the fact that he had come to the relief of the market on a given day with about $20,000,000—$20,000,000 of the money the Government of the United States placed there. He was merely the agency through which the Government of the United States came to the relief of the market. I have never felt in my breast that swelling of admiration and praise for that financier that so many have expressed. If the Government of the United States had intrusted $20,000,000 to any Senator in this body, he could have done the same thing, and would have been entitled to no special credit for it.

Mr. President, I say, in closing, the wise thing for Congress to do is to do nothing, so far as either the expansion or the power to expand the currency is concerned. The occasion for doing anything, if it ever existed, has passed away. I know that I will be met in the minds of some by the statement that we should anticipate the future. If the future knows that it is going to have the protecting and saving hand reached out to it, it will take plunges that otherwise it never would take. If it knows that the stern rule of law and justice will circumscribe it in its conduct, it will not undertake these risky things that we have just seen in the financial world. Let us protect to each community in the United States the money that belongs to it in the reserves. Let us prevent the tilting of the table that shall slide the money to one end of it or the other. That is all. Maintain the financial equilibrium of the country and the necessity for this bill will pass away.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator in charge of the pending bill to consent to have it laid aside temporarily that I may ask for the consideration of the Army pay bill.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. HALE. In the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WARREN. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4030) to fix the pay of the Army.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, what is the order of business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 170, being Senate bill 4030, to fix the pay of the Army.

Mr. CULBERSON. I notice that that is the second bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII. I do not understand that there is any special necessity for asking unanimous consent for its consideration if we are on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. We are not on the Calendar.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Texas the Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pay of officers of the Army is hereby increased as follows: Of lieutenant-generals, 10 per cent; of major-generals and brigadier-generals, 15 per cent; of colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors, 20 per cent; of captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants, 25 per cent; and the pay of cadets at the Military Academy is hereby increased 25 per cent: Provided, That section 1267 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 1569 of the Revised States of the United States, which authorize the President to fix the pay of enlisted men in the Navy, are hereby extended so as to authorize the President to fix the pay of all enlisted men of the Army: Provided, That the average pay now established for enlisted men of the Army shall not be increased by more than 40 per cent.

SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to reduce the pay or allowances now authorized by law for any officer or enlisted man of the Army; and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill to explain section 2.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire——

Mr. CULBERSON. I beg pardon of the Senator. I did not know he had the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to make a single observation. The Senator will be detained but a moment.

I do not rise, Mr. President, to object to the consideration of the bill, but, that the country may understand the exact situation, I will say that I am satisfied, if this bill passes, a similar bill, or one dealing as generously with the Navy as this one does with the Army, will in due time follow. If the Navy is to be discriminated against, I certainly should not only object to the consideration of this bill to-day, but would oppose it to the extent of my ability. Being satisfied, however, that if this bill does become a law, or if it does pass the Senate, the Navy will not be forgotten, I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Texas to ask a question.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to have the Senator in charge of the bill explain section 2. A casual reading would indicate that the President is allowed a discretion to increase the pay of enlisted men within the limit of 40 per cent. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, as I have already indicated, to state if that really is the meaning of that section.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will state that the present law provides exactly that mode of payment for the enlisted men of the Navy and the Revenue-Cutter Service. The Revenue-Cutter Service has a limit—that the pay shall not exceed that paid for the same service by the merchant marine. As to the Navy, no limit is prescribed. This bill merely takes the existing law as to the pay of enlisted men, as it applies to the Navy, and applies it to the Army, the idea being that a little elasticity should obtain on account of changing conditions. There is no limit upon the law as it exists now. The amount for the Navy might be raised 100 per cent. This bill follows the present law, except that it fixes an outside limit of 40 per cent.

I will state, furthermore, I assume that before this bill shall be enacted into law there will be a new schedule of rates. I assume that from the action taken in another place; but I should like to have this bill passed in order that the Military Committee may know the sense of the Senate as to how much higher pay, if any, it is willing the Army should have. There are some committee amendments, which have not yet been read, and which reduce the pay in some instances from that proposed in the bill just read. I should like to have the bill passed practically as it is, with an amendment which the committee will offer separating the Army and Navy for consideration as to increase of pay, the understanding being that both will have equal attention. Then, having the views of the Senate, whether or not they wish to increase the pay of the Army, the matter will, I think, be worked out satisfactorily to the Senator from Texas and to all other Senators.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, if I understand section 2 of the bill, in the event it passes the President would be authorized to increase the pay of enlisted men not exceeding 40 per cent of their present pay. Does not the Senator think it would be better to provide what shall be the pay of enlisted men? Would it not be better to say exactly what they shall draw, instead of leaving a discretion to the President in regard to fixing their pay? I am prepared to say that I do not believe that the enlisted men are now properly paid for their services, but instead of leaving it to the discretion of the President to say whether the pay shall be increased by 40 per cent, should not Congress itself assume that responsibility?

Mr. WARREN. I was speaking only in regard to what Congresses preceding us had done.

Mr. CLAY. If a Congress preceding us did wrong in regard to fixing the compensation of the Navy, is that any reason why we should do wrong as to fixing the compensation for the Army?

Mr. WARREN. Is the Senator prepared to say it is wrong?

Mr. CLAY. I am prepared to say this, that Congress itself ought to say how much the enlisted men should be paid and how much the officers should be paid. A schedule of wages ought to be fixed by Congress itself.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator such a schedule to offer now?

Mr. CLAY. I have not. I am not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me for a moment, I think his suggestion will bear good fruit, but the first difficulty in which the committee finds itself is that it has before it an appropriation bill touching the margin of this question, but certainly not sufficiently covering it, awaiting the action of the Military Committee, and the committee would like to know whether or not the Senate of the United States desires to increase the pay of the Army; and if it is willing that we may increase it, that it may say how much. Then the committee will see to it that a proper schedule is applied. The committee feels sure from the present outlook that this whole matter will have to be finally carried in the Army appropriation bill. Therefore we ask the Senate now, in this bill, to advise us. Shall the pay of the Army be increased; if so, how much? And shall it apply to commissioned officers as well as to "rank and file?" Having such advice, the committee will work out the details as to schedules.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, with reference to section 2, I should like to ask the chairman how, by passing the bill in its present form, we are to get the schedule to which he refers? I am very seriously opposed to this section of the bill. I think Congress abdicates its constitutional functions in undertaking to invest the President with power to fix the compensation of the enlisted men of the Army. I think Congress itself should do it.

Again, this provision leaves it open to the Executive, who probably would not himself act, but through some board, to increase the compensation of some classes of the enlisted men 10 per cent, some of the other classes 20 per cent, some other classes 40 per cent. There should be unquestionably, according to my judgment, a schedule fixed. Congress ought to determine how much compensation an enlisted man should receive, and that should be a fixture and not subject to change by Executive order or Executive rule.

I thoroughly agree, Mr. President, that the enlisted men of the Army do not at present receive enough compensation. There should be an increase. Whether it should reach as high as 40 per cent is a question about which I have some misgivings, but that there should be some increase I do not think is a debatable proposition. Our Army is not able at the present time to keep its quota up to the standard that it ought to have, by reason of the fact that men are not receiving sufficient compensation to induce them to remain in the Army. But it seems to me if we are going to fix a schedule, we ought not to pass the bill in this form.

With respect to the first section of the bill, I do not believe that the lieutenant-generals and the major-generals ought to have an increase at all. The compensation of those officers is now more than that of a Senator or Representative. I see no just ground for increasing those higher grades. The lower grades of officers should undoubtedly be increased. I have no objection to the increases indicated in this bill in that respect, but I am emphatically opposed to the second section of the bill. If we are going to have a schedule at some future time, I see no reason why the Senate should now pass a bill vesting that power in the Executive.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator who has just spoken is a distinguished and very useful member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and yet I believe he would hardly wish to-day to himself submit a schedule of salaries and vouch for its providing a correct and equitable increase. The condition is this: We are confronted with an appropriation bill which comes over from the House and which is now before the Committee on Military Affairs. In that bill is a schedule covering a part of those whom we wish to consider in the increase of salaries. The House has not made a complete schedule, nor does it provide as much as does the schedule which has been submitted heretofore by the War Department.

I am informed through the public press that the pay schedule did not leave the House and come over here in the form in which the House would like to have it, or in which it is expected to pass. If the bill passes to-day, so that we may see within what limits of increase the Senate will sustain us, the Committee on Military Affairs will arrange a schedule and present it to the Senate for its approval and later will have it in conference.

As to the remark of my friend, the Senator from Tennessee, about the percentage of raise, I do not know what his ideas may be in comparing the Army with the Navy, but the present average pay of the Navy to-day, the rank and file, is $33 per month per man, as against $17.73 for the Army. If you add 40 per cent to $17.73 you get very, very far from $33. In other words, the men in the Navy, in its rank and file, are now receiving almost exactly twice what the Army is receiving, while this bill, if it passes, would only allow us to carry the Army pay up to 40 per cent, and that makes only 75 per cent or three-quarters of the present pay of the Navy, and yet the Navy seeks still higher pay. I should feel, if I was in the Committee on Military Affairs and the Senate passed a bill that gave an average increase of 40 per cent, that we could act within that limit.

I may say, by the way, that this bill was drawn, considered, and reported at a time when the only pay bills before us were those based upon this section 2. There were pay bills before the Naval Affairs Committee, and pay bills before the Committee on Military Affairs of both House and Senate, and all of them reached the question of increase of pay in this way, and the members of the Military Affairs Committee presumed that this might be the manner in which the Senate would wish to treat it since this system has prevailed for many, many years in paying the Navy. Since then have occurred the developments which I have mentioned, and, as I said before, the committee now is confronted with a different condition.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the consensus of opinion in the Senate seems to be that the present pay of the enlisted men of the Army is insufficient. There is a contrariety of opinion in reference to how it shall be increased—whether by the Congress itself directly, including, of course, the approval of the President if it become a law, or whether it shall be left to the discretion of the President.

I am one of those who believe that the Congress ought to enact the law and fix the compensation, and consequently I am opposed to the passage of this bill in its present shape, because if it passes in that shape it will go to the other body with a favorable expression on the part of the Senate for this section 2, when, in my judgment, that is not the opinion of the Senate—at least a portion of the Senate. In order to present the issue, I offer as a substitute for section 2 the following:

SEC. 2. That the pay of the enlisted men of the Army is hereby increased 30 per cent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 2 and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. That the pay of the enlisted men of the Army is hereby increased 30 per cent.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say that, as a member of the Military Affairs Committee, I opposed that provision of the bill which provides that the Executive shall fix the pay. It seemed to be the understanding, however, sir, that a schedule was to be fixed in the appropriation bill, and with that understanding I was willing to let this bill come here. Since the amendment has been offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] I shall be compelled to vote for it.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, it seems to me it would be wise for this bill to go over at least to-day. In its present shape I could not vote for it. I do not think it is any part of the office of the President of the United States to fix the pay of the Army which he commands, and I think it is trenching upon the history of our Government, although it may be that some precedent may be found about the Navy here or there upon which it has been patterned. The Senate has had a very heavy day of work. Many of its members have been occupied in one or two committees and have had a chance to participate but briefly in its session. I hope the bill may go over to-day, so that each of us may have some opportunity to reflect upon it.

The bill puts the cart before the horse. It provides a certain range of promotion without the Senate as yet indicating any sense as to what degree of increase of salary should occur. We ought first to fix the salary or wage or allowance of the soldier and then test the question of the passage of the bill.

Waiting until some other committee or any committee can satisfy their minds as to what is proper as an increase of a soldier's pay is to anticipate something of which we have no conception and which is totally dependent upon extraneous conditions of which we can form no judgment; and there is not the slightest occasion, propriety, or necessity for hurrying this bill through the Senate. We should have at least the opportunity to consider its provisions carefully, form our own mind as to its details, and then upon debate vote. I do not think we can have such a debate or consideration this afternoon, and I hope that the bill may go over until a season better adapted for its consideration than this late hour.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I only wish to say that with an amendment which the Senator in charge of the bill has this will, in my judgment, be the best method of legislating affecting the pay both of the Army and Navy. The two branches in pay have certain similarities and certain marked differences. It is practically impossible to make a general statute that shall apply fairly to both branches of the military service. The Senator in charge of the bill has an amendment which makes this bill purely an Army bill, relating to the pay of the Army.

The occasion, I take it, in fact he has so stated, of its being called up now is that upon the Army appropriation bill the House has taken up and dealt with the subject and incorporated a provision touching the pay of soldiers and the lower ranks, not the commissioned officers, in the Army, and that brings the matter, whether we will or not, directly and squarely before the Senate. The Senate committee must deal with that proposition which has come in the Army appropriation bill from the House; and I take it that the Senator's object in asking for action to-day is that the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate may have, in a way, for its guidance or suggestion the action of the Senate, so that in completing the bill the whole subject-matter of the pay of the Army, the rank and file, the noncommissioned officers, and the commissioned officers, may be considered.

If the bill passes with the amendment which the Senator has it will be, as I think it should be, a purely Army bill. There is no danger of any surprise or any action being forestalled without the Senate knowing it. It will go first, as a bill passed, back to the House. Also it will be in order as an amendment to the Army appropriation bill. It will be considered there. It can not move an inch toward becoming a law, and none of the questions that have been raised by Senators here to-day can be settled until it is reported and debated with that full freedom of debate which characterizes the consideration of appropriation bills in the Senate.

It will then pass through another crucible of the conference committee between the two Houses, and that report can never pass and become law without being thoroughly and completely considered by both Houses. So I think the object of the Senator who has charge of this bill is in the direction not only of doing something, but doing it in a safe and a right way.

Mainly, I rose for the purpose of saying that the bill being made, as I think it should be, a purely Army matter for the deliberate and continued consideration of both bodies, I should like to say, as a natural result, that the subject of the pay of the Navy will be considered by itself by the two committees of the two Houses on full and complete report and consideration before both bodies. I have no apprehension, Mr. President, that if at last out of this full consideration the two Houses agree upon a suitable provision for the Army, rank and file, noncommissioned and commissioned officers, Congress will also consider and pass in due time, probably upon the naval appropriation bill, some corresponding measure that shall deal fairly with the question of the increase in the pay of the Navy, both rank and file and commissioned officers. I have no apprehension that Congress will adjourn after having increased the pay of one branch of the military service of the United States and leave in the lurch the other branch. Therefore I think it is in the interest of good legislation that this proposition shall be forwarded under the methods that the practice and the rules of the two Houses make one of complete safety and full consideration.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he sits down, if he will allow me.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Exactly what do we gain by taking this bill up now, and do we gain anything by leaving the matter to the President and leaving it in doubt as to what he may do? Is not this body and the other one the proper bodies to fix the compensation of soldiers and sailors?

Mr. HALE. I have not gone into that, but undoubtedly in the interest of legislation it is proper and fitting that the Senate, its Military Committee being confronted with the consideration of the Army bill which has upon it a provision for the pay of the Army, should pass some bill which will make it in order as an amendment to the military appropriation bill, so that when a provision is reported, perhaps by the unanimous voice of the committee, it shall not be subject to the point of order which is met by the rule that a bill which has passed the Senate is in order as an amendment to an appropriation bill.

I take it that that consideration largely has dwelt in the mind of the Senator from Wyoming, who has charge of the bill. The whole question as to whether fundamentally the pay of the rank and file shall be fixed by the President or by determinate legislation is one which will be considered fully under all these stages before it finally comes up for action. I did not go into that.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it strikes me there is a vicious principle in the second section of the bill. I think it is the duty of Congress to fix the compensation of sailors and soldiers, and not the President, and if we want to instruct the Committee on Military Affairs as to what the sentiment of the Senate is we ought to have something more definite than what is found in section 2.

The President might fix the salary 5 per cent more than it is at present, or 10 per cent, or 20 per cent, or 40 per cent, but it appears to me that 40 per cent is not any too much. I believe we should have something definite. It is not our business to leave this matter to the President. I think the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is a conservative one, and I think if he figures it up he will find the increase is pretty small. I do not believe myself——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will say to the Senator that I fixed it at 30 per cent increase because in a conversation with one or two members of the Committee on Military Affairs they expressed the opinion that that was about right. I am not wedded to 30 per cent. I want to get at the principle that Congress, and not the President, shall fix the pay of the enlisted men of the United States Army.

Mr. TELLER. I am in accord with that.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Texas will change his amendment so that the average increase shall be 40 per cent, because some will have to be more and some less——

Mr. TELLER. How is that?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will fix his amendment so that the average pay shall be increased 40 per cent, I shall not resist the amendment.

Mr. TELLER. How do you mean—the average? Do you mean to equalize?

Mr. WARREN. There are certain noncommissioned officers and other enlisted men who must have, on account of differences in later modes of warfare, the introduction of electricity, etc., larger increases than others; hence the proposition is to raise the pay of all, but to provide that the average increase should not exceed 40 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. The chairman is mistaken. That was not the proposition. The proposition was to let the President determine that question. I want it determined here.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think the Senator understands me. The Senator from Texas has now offered an amendment which gives to the rank and file an increase of 30 per cent. I say if he will make it 40 per cent, and use the language we have, simply that it shall average not to exceed 40 per cent, I shall have no objection, and that is exactly what the Senator from Colorado has said he is willing the increase shall be—40 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. What I want and what I am going to stand for, and I think the Senate ought to stand for it, is that we ourselves should determine this question. Are we afraid to do it? I am not, so far as I am concerned. I have known for many years that the soldiers of the United States were underpaid. I realize, as has been said here, that you can not keep an army such as you ought to have in time of peace on the miserable payment that we have been making for a good many years. I am quite willing to increase it an average of 40 per cent. What I am contending for is that it is our business to do it and not the President's business. Whatever is legislation belongs to us. Whatever is executive belongs to the President. We are as able to settle this as is the President, and I want Congress to settle it because I want to know what the men will get. I would not be satisfied if the President should give them 5 or 10 or 20 per cent increase.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Colorado that the increase should not be too small. I simply said, as to putting in section 2, that it was similar to the provision providing pay for the Navy, which law, if I am not mistaken, the Senator from Colorado was a party in enacting. I shall be glad to accept the amendment of the Senator from Texas if in it he will increase 40 per cent the average of the Army.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator thinks because we made a blunder some time ago, that is a reason why we should do it again now.

Mr. WARREN. No; I do not say that excuses it. Nor do I say it was a blunder.

Mr. TELLER. I may have been present in the Senate when it was done. If the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] got up and said it was the right thing to do, I may have considered that it was the right thing to do and let it pass.

Mr. HALE. I should hope so.

Mr. TELLER. But I have never knowingly voted to give the President legislative power.

Mr. WARREN. I am glad my friend the Senator from Colorado has made the demarcation between the Senator from Maine, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Senator from Wyoming, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, even though it may not be very flattering to me.

Mr. TELLER. No. The Senator from Maine is the head of the Naval Committee, and I have followed him on naval matters because I know that he knows more about it than I do. Then I thought, perhaps, representing an inland people, it might be somewhat presumptuous for me to suggest that I knew enough about it to take much part in it. But I have never in my life consented to the transfer of the legislative power to the Executive. I have believed and believe now that if there is any danger at all to the country in its liberties, it comes from the fact that we do not keep the distinction between the executive and the legislative powers; and if this bill can be fixed in any way that we may fix it so that the increase may be a legislative act and not an executive act, I am prepared to support it.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming in regard to the language suggested by him as to the average. If the language is incorporated in the bill as suggested by the Senator, would that average be afterwards determined and fixed in detail by the Appropriation Committee, or will it still be a matter to be determined by executive decision as to how the average shall be distributed?

Mr. WARREN. Undoubtedly it would be fixed by the committee having charge of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BACON. The appropriation bill, in other words, will proceed to distribute this average in such a way as will definitely designate the particular amount to go to each rank and class of enlisted men?

Mr. WARREN. That will undoubtedly be the course pursued.

Mr. BACON. Now, I hope the Senator from Wyoming will go a little further. He said he would not resist the amendment. I hope it may be understood that that amendment will be agreeable to all parties, because the matter which has been under discussion is one that is so radical to some of us who feel that we would not be willing for it to go to a vote without very considerable discussion, if it is a matter still in doubt.

It is not simply the fact, as it would be ordinarily, of submitting or delegating to the Executive Department the power of legislation, but it would be a delegation in the most dangerous of all branches of legislation, a delegation to the Executive to fix the pay of the soldiers whom he commands as Commander in Chief.

Mr. President, it would be absolutely at war with every principle upon which the civil liberties of the race to which we belong are founded. For that reason I make the suggestion that those who are favoring the immediate consideration of this bill should let us know that not simply there would be on the part of some a failure to resist, as expressed by the Senator from Wyoming, but that we might show that there was a consensus of opinion upon the subject, as there frequently is when we have to deal with matters of legislation.

I feel that Senators must recognize the fact that of all things the most improper would be to put within the power of the Executive the question whether or not the pay of a soldier should be raised or should be lowered. Of all things, that is a matter to be kept out from his consideration or determination in any manner, shape, or form.

Mr WARREN. I have already said that I shall be glad to accept the amendment, with the word "average" in, of course. In view of the drastic denunciation of the Senator from Georgia that this bill would put us at war "with the civil liberties of the race to which we belong," I suppose I ought to apologize to the Senate and to every member of it for following the precedents here in taking what is now the existing law and applying it to one arm of the fighting force as it has been applied to the other for nearly one hundred years. This is the first time I ever heard any point raised or any criticism of this hoary-headed old law under which we have so long prospered. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I want to put myself on record as the Senator from Colorado has done. If I had been present when it was done I certainly would never have given my acquiescence to such a provision of law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the Senator from Massachusetts proceeds I would be glad to answer an inquiry as to the reformation of this proposed amendment so that he may have the advantage of it.

Mr. LODGE. Before the amendment is offered I should like to say a word.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not ask that it be agreed to, but merely present it in a modified form before the Senator begins.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon; certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move as a substitute the following:

That the average pay of enlisted men of the Army as now established is hereby increased 40 per cent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. That the average pay of enlisted men of the Army as now established is hereby increased 40 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the difficulty with that proposition is this: Owing to the change in conditions of modern warfare, perhaps the most important branch of the service to-day is the Coast Artillery and the men who are charged with the management of the great guns in our coast fortifications. Those men, with the present rigid pay of the Army, are the most underpaid of all, because it requires men with great skill in electrical matters to be fit to do the work. Men go out from the Government service—men who have been employed in the coast forts and have been taught the business—go out and get $100 and $150 a month at once from electrical companies. After the Government has educated them and taught them they go out, because the moment they leave the service they get greatly increased pay. The committee was informed of one case where a company in New York paid the purchase money, $250, for a sergeant and paid him $150 a month in their employ subsequently.

Now, you can not get skilled and trained men for that most important branch of the service unless you pay them more highly than you pay privates and sergeants in other branches of the service.

Mr. TELLER. May I ask the Senator a question? Could not that be arranged by giving them different grades so as to increase their salaries? Should not that be done? Should not the people who are handling the guns, electrical contrivances, and machines have a designation different from that which they now have?

Mr. LODGE. They are privates in the Army and sergeants and corporals like the rest. They are getting now somewhat higher pay, but I do not understand that a rigid advance of 40 per cent all around will be enough to provide for those men.

Mr. TELLER. I doubt whether it will.

Mr. WARREN. I will say, while the House allowed but 10 or 20 per cent in some cases, in at least two cases it allowed as high as 100 per cent. My idea was that the average of 40 per cent would of course be used to pay some of them a larger per cent and some of them a smaller per cent. Of course whatever is paid over 40 per cent to one class would have to come off the 40 per cent in some other class.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely; I understand that. That is why it seems to me that the provision under which our civil liberties have been withering for the last ten years in the Navy, and which has prevented the Navy pay from falling into the condition of the Army pay, is so necessary in order to give some elasticity in grading the pay.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to say one word at this point in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts. I have been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs for fifteen years, and during that time we have not increased the pay in the Navy. I want to say that in justice to myself, because my friend from Colorado and my friend from Georgia and others think the committee raised the pay 40 per cent.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. LODGE. I will yield in a minute. I did not say the Naval Committee had raised the Navy pay. I said it was done under the law which enabled the Department to grade the pay in the Navy (for it is the Department which does it, of course), the seamen and enlisted men and the warrant officers were paid appropriately according to their grade, because there was a certain measure of elasticity which the Department was able to give by averaging the pay in the pay table.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. In response to what the Senator from Colorado said, and also what the Senator from Massachusetts somewhat inferred, I desire to say that nothing I have said or designed to say was intended to indicate any indisposition on my part to have the pay increased. On the contrary, I think it ought to be increased both in the Army and in the Navy. I simply wish to give my adhesion to the suggestions which have been forcibly made by Senators who preceded me, to the effect that those increases should always be made by the legislative branch and should not be left to the discretion of the Executive.

Mr. LODGE. I think that the pay of both services ought to be raised. The Army pay is lower than the Navy pay, and is improperly graded and distributed, owing to the fact that the Army has not had the advantage which the Navy has had of permitting the Department to grade and average the pay and arrange the pay table.

The act of 1898 raised the naval pay and at the same time enhanced the injustice of the personnel bill, making the pay of the Navy dependent upon the Army. It increased the pay of all naval officers at that time except those on the retired list and certain staff officers. This measure would simply continue that. I think this Army pay bill ought to be entirely disassociated, in the first place, from the Navy pay, so that they should not clash at all. In the second place, I think we ought to have the liberal increase which the bill of the committee requires.

For myself I desire to say that unless much stronger reasons are brought forward than I have yet heard, I hope that the power of arranging the different rates of pay will be left to the Department in the Army as it is in the Navy. As long as the power to vote the money is in Congress all the Department can do is to grade and arrange the rates of pay.

From the little knowledge I have had as to the work of arranging pay tables for the Army, it seems to me that it will be something that the Senate will find exceedingly difficult to do, or any committee of the Senate or the committees of both Houses. We vote the lump sum and we fix a general rate of pay by saying that it shall average 40 per cent above the present rate. All that we leave to the Department or to the President, of course, as named in the bill, is the right to grade and distribute that pay, so that it shall not average more than 40 per cent, but to enable them to meet exigencies and to affix increased pay to the more difficult and responsible duties.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I see a great deal of force in the suggestion of the Senator as to some elasticity in the matter of arrangement, but the Senator will notice that in the bill it is not simply a matter of distribution of the increase, but the question whether or not there shall be the increase is left to the President. That is the objection which I have to it.

It is possible that in the appropriation bill, when this matter comes to be dealt with in detail, it may be well to incorporate the idea of the Senator that there should be sufficient elasticity in order that the gradation and distribution could be conveniently and properly made. But the vital objection to the bill is that the question whether the pay shall or shall not be raised at all is left to the President. He can raise it 40 per cent, or he can refuse to raise it at all. That is the objection I have to it.

Mr. LODGE. I have not the bill before me, but I suppose it was the purpose of the clause to enable the President or the Department to do exactly what is done in cases in the Navy. If we have to deal with that question here, we shall find our time constantly taken up with readjustments of the pay table.

However, Mr. President, I trust that in some form this bill will be passed, disassociated entirely from the naval pay, which ought to be in a complete bill, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has suggested. I think we ought to pave the way for dealing with this in an appropriation bill. The low rate of pay which is received by the American soldier to-day is a crying shame, to my mind.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I shall take only a moment. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], referring to the proposition of the President fixing the pay of the rank and file in the Navy, said that in the personnel if I stated that it was right he allowed it to go. I want to assume an attitude of modesty and not claim anything that does not belong to me. In reporting the personnel bill I took the provision as it was inherited—it was not new legislation—leaving it to the President to fix the pay of the rank and file. In the Revised Statutes, section 1569, the provision is:

> The pay to be allowed to petty officers, excepting mates, and the pay and bounty upon enlistment of seamen, ordinary seamen, firemen, and coal heavers in the naval service shall be fixed by the President.

It is older than that even, for in the act approved April 18, 1814, the provision was adopted by Congress that the pay of the rank and file of the minor officers of the Navy should be fixed by the President, and the only limitation in terms provided in the Revised Statutes was that it should not exceed the amount appropriated by the appropriation bill of the year for that purpose. So this feature, whether it is good or not, is a very old feature.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, if I correctly understand him, our civil liberties were wrecked by granting this power to the President in 1814, under Mr. Madison.

Mr. BACON. If they have not been wrecked with that power, it has been simply the grace of God.

Mr. WARREN. A renewal of the law of 1814 in the law of 1898 in almost the exact language would seem to be an indorsement by the Senate of what had been done every year from 1814 to 1898, and the Senate has indorsed it every year since in the Navy appropriation bill.

Mr. TELLER. I want to disclaim having been here in 1814. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I will say further, as an indication of what I think finally ought to be done, that in preparing the bill which I introduced fixing the pay of all the Navy I fixed determinately the pay not only of officers but noncommissioned officers and seamen, the rank and file, upon the theory that Congress had better do that. But that is not really settled here. If we pass this bill it leaves the committee in a position where it can deal with the subject.

I hope Senators will, under the circumstances, yield their objection and let us pass the bill, and pass it over to the committee that has it in charge. That committee is represented by very experienced, old, instructed Senators, and I have no fear that they will report anything that will endanger the liberties perhaps nor unduly increase the appropriation.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I should like to hear the amendment read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Strike out section 2 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

> SEC. 2. That the average pay of enlisted men of the Army as now established is hereby increased 40 per cent.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, if the amendment proposes to increase the pay of all the enlisted men 40 per cent, it meets my approval, but if that is the object of the amendment I do not see any necessity for the word "average," because when you speak of an average increase it must be upon the theory that the increase of pay of some of the enlisted men will be more than 40 per cent, while the increase of pay of others will be less than 40 per cent. If that is the idea of the amendment, I oppose it. I do not believe that it is a good amendment. I do not believe it ought to be left to the discretion of the President or the Department or anybody else to say how much the increase shall be in one class of enlisted men and how much in another class.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Mississippi will pardon me, I asked the question of the Senator from Wyoming——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. BACON. I asked the Senator from Wyoming whether the matter of averaging will be left to the Executive Department or whether it will be attended to in detail when the appropriation bill is acted upon. He said that it would be the latter; in other words, that it will not be left to the Executive Department, but in the appropriation bill there will be various designations of pay, various ranks will be paid, so that we will at least have to pass on the question as to whether the distribution has been properly made.

Mr. McLAURIN. If we are going to enact a law for an increase in the pay, and if this is the bill that is to be enacted into law for an increase, why not name the amount of increase here? What is the necessity for designating in the appropriation bill that which ought to be designated in this bill? This bill ought to name the amount that is to be given to the enlisted men, to the officers, and to the noncommissioned officers, and then the appropriation ought to be made to fit this bill. This bill ought not to be made to fit the appropriation bill. The appropriation bill is for the purpose of appropriating money to defray the expenses of the Government as those expenses are designated by law.

Mr. BACON. As I understand the purpose of passing the bill now, it is to put the law in a shape so that it can be incorporated in the appropriation bill. Unless this bill is passed, the items put in the appropriation bill will be subject to a point of order. I hope some member of the Military Committee will take this trouble off my hands. I am not as familiar with it as I ought to be, but I understood that to be the statement of the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. My attention was diverted.

Mr. McLAURIN. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. My attention was drawn another way, and I did not hear the Senator; but I accept the amendment of the Senator from Texas in the form in which it was read at the desk. To strike out the word "average" in it would, of course, place the amendment where I could not acccept it, because the very object of raising the pay of the Army is to raise some more than others, because some positions of enlisted men are constantly filled, while others we can not keep filled. The House foreseeing that, have increased the pay schedule 100 per cent for some men and a much less increase for others.

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question just there?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. Are not those skilled men of whom the Senator from Massachusetts spoke now receiving more pay than the ordinary enlisted man?

Mr. WARREN. A corporal is receiving more than a private; a sergeant is receiving more than a corporal, but if you want noncommissioned officers or privates who are very skillful, say, as electricians, we have heretofore neglected to provide pay enough for them. There is now no law for sufficient pay for them as to certain of the regiments and arms of service. We have made partial provision in certain arms, like the artillery, but not in others.

Mr. McLAURIN. Does not the electrician now receive more than the ordinary enlisted man?

Mr. WARREN. Not enough more so that the places can be filled.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then why not state that the increase in the pay of electricians shall be such a per cent, but that all enlisted men shall receive an increase of 40 per cent?

Mr. WARREN. But they are all enlisted men. They occupy different positions as enlisted men.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then put it "all other enlisted men."

Mr. du PONT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. du PONT. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi for a moment to a fact. The trouble has always been in the regular service, and is now, that the noncommissioned officers' pay is entirely too little compared with that of privates. Under any proper pay bill there should be a much greater relative increase in the pay of noncommissioned officers, particularly the higher grades, than they now obtain. Therefore the word "average" is of great importance to enable those discrepancies to be corrected.

I will say, more than that, that it would materially benefit the Army to have some provision made for the retention in the service of soldiers who have served a certain length of time, so that the Army might have the advantage of their experience.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware sees a difficulty in this matter. I also see a difficulty in the matter which I do not think ought to be permitted to remain in the bill. If noncommissioned officers are receiving less pay than they should in proportion to the pay of private soldiers, their pay ought to be increased by a greater per cent. So also with the electricians. But the private soldier ought not to be required to depend upon the fixing of a rate by somebody who is not going to look after him. This Senate and this Congress ought to look after his rights and to protect them in law. If this increase is to be made greater in behalf of the noncommissioned officers and the electricians, and therefore necessarily less in behalf of the private soldier, who is to do that? Ought it not to be done by the law?

Mr. BACON. I was extremely unfortunate——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I was extremely unfortunate if the Senator did not understand what I had said that I understood to have been stated by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. McLAURIN. I understood what the Senator said.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me. The statement was that we were going to do exactly what the Senator from Mississippi, with so much earnestness, says we should do. We will not do it now, but we will do it when it comes to the Army appropriation bill, when all of these details have to be attended to. The fact that those men are not specified in this bill does not in any manner militate against the principle for which the Senator from Mississippi contends, because the matter is not to be left to any executive officer. It is to be attended to when the appropriation bill comes before us, where it will be stated in detail how much a sergeant shall receive, how much a corporal shall receive, how much a private soldier shall receive, and, if necessary, how much an electrician shall receive. Under the statement made by the Senator from Wyoming nothing is to be left to an executive officer. Everything that the Senator so earnestly desires is, as we understand, to be attended to when the bill comes before us for the final appropriation of the money.

This bill enables the appropriation bill to make that provision, and without this bill it could not be done in the appropriation bill. That is the sole object of the passage of this bill now—to pave the way for the adding in the appropriation bill of the very thing the Senator from Mississippi wants done and insists shall be done.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is always the case—put the private soldier off to another day.

Mr. BACON. No. Under this bill both the private soldier and the officer will have to wait until the appropriation bill is passed. There is no distinction made as to either one of them in that regard.

Mr. McLAURIN. If this bill should name the per cent of increase for the enlisted man and the noncommissioned officer and the electrician—to put them all, if you please, upon the footing of the enlisted man—if it should name what per cent of increase the electrician shall have, what the noncommissioned officer shall have, and then what the other enlisted men shall have, it would be just as easy then for the appropriation bill to fix the amount necessary to defray the expenses of the Army; but when it comes to the private soldier, he must be put off until the appropriation bill comes up, and then probably he will be put off again. In other words, never do to-day what you can put off until to-morrow would seem to be the principle upon which this matter proceeds.

Mr. President, it is easy enough to fix the per cent that is to be given as an increase to each one of these classes of enlisted men. I am not sufficiently informed in military affairs to know whether a noncommissioned officer is considered an enlisted man or not; but I suppose from the statements made here to-day that he is regarded as an enlisted man.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 5, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 4, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RELIEF OF ALASKA PACIFIC RAILWAY AND TERMINAL COMPANY.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4351) for the relief of the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company.

Be it enacted, etc., That the time of the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company to comply with the provisions of sections 4 and 5 of chapter 299 of the laws of the United States, entitled "An act extending the homestead laws and providing for the right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved May 14, 1898, in acquiring and completing its railroad now under construction in Alaska is hereby extended, as follows:

First. The time to file the map and profile of definite location of its second section of at least 20 miles with the register of the land office in the district of Alaska, as provided in said sections 4 and 5, is hereby extended to and including the 18th day of March, 1909.

Second. The time to complete the first section of at least 20 miles of its railroad, as provided in said section 5, is hereby extended to and including the 18th day of March, 1909, and such railroad company shall be entitled to all the benefits conferred upon it by the provisions of such act upon its due compliance with all the provisions thereof, excepting only the provisions thereof relating to the filing of the map and profile of definite location of its second section of not less than 20 miles of its road: Provided, That it shall have, successively, one year each after said 18th day of March, 1909, in which to file the map and profile of its definite location of the succeeding sections of not less than 20 miles each: And provided further, That it shall have five years in which to complete its entire line.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill was reported yesterday and nobody has had an opportunity to look at it. Representations have been made as to the great emergency of the matter. It is not the fault of the House that the bill was not reported sooner, and until we can have an opportunity to see it I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Later—

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I now renew my request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan renews his request for unanimous consent in order to consider the bill which was reported a few minutes ago. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS TIDE WATERS ON EAST SIDE OF SHEEPSCOT RIVER, MAINE.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 16073.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16073) to authorize the town of Edgecomb, Lincoln County, Me., to maintain a free bridge across tide waters.

Be it enacted, etc., That the town of Edgecomb, in the county of Lincoln and State of Maine, is hereby authorized to maintain a free bridge in the manner and according to the plans thereof which have been heretofore approved by the Secretary of War, and with all the rights to build, rebuild, and maintain the same which would have existed if the same had been regularly authorized prior to its construction, said bridge extending across a cove on the easterly side of Sheepscot River in said Edgecomb between upland belonging to John P. Chase, formerly belonging to Norris & Gay, and upland belonging to Caroline P. Trask; the same to be maintained as part of the town road laid out by the selectmen of the town of Edgecomb May 4, 1903, and accepted by said town May 13, 1903.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the right to amend or repeal this act is expressely reserved.

The SPEAKER. This bill was read yesterday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLEFIELD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMENDING SECTION 4896, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15841) to amend section 4896 of the Revised Statutes.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4896 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by inserting after the words "in his lifetime" the words "and when any person having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted becomes insane before a patent is granted, the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve upon his legally appointed guardian, conservator, or representative in trust for his estate, in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him while sane;" and by inserting at the end of said section the following words: "The foregoing section, as to insane persons, is to cover all applications now on file in the Patent Office or which may be hereafter made," so that the same section as amended will read as follows:

"SEC. 4896. When any person, having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted, dies before a patent is granted, the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve on his executor or administrator, in trust for the heirs at law of the deceased, in case he shall have died intestate; or if he shall have left a will disposing of the same, then in trust for his devisees in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him in his lifetime; and when any person having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted becomes insane before a patent is granted, the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve on his legally appointed guardian, conservator, or representative in trust for his estate, in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him while sane; and when the application is made by such legal representatives, the oath or affirmation required to be made shall be so varied in form that it can be made by them. The executor or administrator duly authorized under the law of any foreign country to administer upon the estate of the deceased inventor shall, in case the said inventor was not domiciled in the United States at the time of his death, have the right to apply for and obtain the patent. The authority of such foreign executor or administrator shall be proved by certificate of a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States.

"The foregoing section, as to insane persons, is to cover all applications now on file in the Patent Office or which may be hereafter made."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, just a few words in regard to this bill. The object of the bill is to correct a palpable error in the existing statute, which occurred when it was last amended. On February 28, 1899, section 4896 was amended by inserting therein the provision that when an inventor became insane his legally appointed guardian, conservator, or representative in trust for his estate would have the right of applying for and obtaining a patent. This statute was again amended by the act approved March 3, 1903, by adding thereto the following provision:

The executor or administrator duly authorized under the law of any foreign country to administer upon the estate of the deceased inventor shall, in case the said inventor was not domiciled in the United States at the time of his death, have the right to apply for and obtain the patent. The authority of such foreign executor or administrator shall be proved by a certificate of a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States.

But in that act, after the provision for the amendment, it was stated—

"4896. When any person, having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted, dies before a patent is granted, the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve on his executor or administrator, in trust for the heirs at law of the deceased, in case he shall have died intestate; or if he shall have left a will disposing of the same, then in trust for his devisees, in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him in his lifetime; and when the application is made by such legal representatives, the oath or affirmation required to be made shall be so varied in form that it can be made by them. The executor or administrator duly authorized under the law of any foreign country to administer upon the estate of the deceased inventor shall, in case the said inventor was not domiciled in the United States at the time of his death, have the right to apply for and obtain the patent. The authority of such foreign executor or administrator shall be proved by certificate of a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States."

thus leaving from the statute the provision as to the guardian for the insane inventor which was inserted in the act of February 28, 1899. The purpose of the present amendment is to make the law clear on the point that an application for a patent of an inventor who has become insane may be made by his legal representative, there having been many cases where, through the lack of such a provision in the statute, inventions have been lost, to the great damage of the inventor and his family.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider and lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Indian appropriation bill, to nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference thereon with the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Indian appropriation bill with Senate amendments, to disagree to the same, and ask for a conference. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair announces the following conferees:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN of New York, Mr. MARSHALL, and Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

H. R. 598. An act granting an increase of pension to William Poor.

DESIGN FOR A STATUE OF THE LATE COMMODORE JOHN D. SLOAT AT MONTEREY, CAL.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 101.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution 101, authorizing the Secretary of War to secure a suitable design for a statue of the late Commodore John D. Sloat at Monterey, Cal.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to use, for the purpose of securing a suitable design for a statue of the late Commodore John D. Sloat, so much as may be necessary of the amount appropriated by the act of March 4, 1907, entitled "An act to aid in the completion of a monument at Monterey, Cal., to commemorate the taking possession of the Pacific coast by Commodore John D. Sloat, United States Navy."

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That the total amount used for securing said design shall not exceed $1,000.

The SPEAKER. The request is to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the joint resolution and consider it in the House. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are a lot of these bills in reference to building monuments or something of the sort, caring for various homes, etc. Is it the expectation to call them up one at a time?

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman this is not a new bill. Congress at the last session passed a bill appropriating $10,000 to build a monument at Monterey to commemorate the taking possession of the Pacific coast by Commodore Sloat. The War Department held that it could not use any portion of this $10,000 to obtain a design.

This is a joint resolution authorizing the use of not to exceed $1,000 of the appropriation heretofore made for that purpose. It makes no further appropriation. It simply construes the act.

Mr. MANN. When you pay $1,000 for a design where $10,000 has been appropriated, does it not involve a considerable appropriation hereafter?

Mr. NEEDHAM. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Is it not the intention of the gentleman or some of his colleagues to ask for additional appropriation for this monument?

Mr. NEEDHAM. I will say to the gentleman that it is not.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. NEEDHAM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

DAM ACROSS RAINY RIVER.

Mr. BEDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15444) extending the time for the construction of the dam across Rainy River.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BEDE] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the construction of a dam across Rainy River for the Koochiching Company, its successors and assigns, or for the Rainy River Improvement Company, under chapter 238 of volume 30 of the Statutes at Large, as modified by chapter 1305 of volume 32 of the Statutes at Large and chapter 797 of volume 33 of the Statutes at Large, is hereby extended to July 1, 1912, subject to the provisions of the acts aforesaid.

Also the following amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Rainy River Improvement Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota as the successor to the rights and privileges heretofore granted to the Koochiching Company under the following acts of Congress, namely, chapter 238, of volume 30, Statutes at Large, entitled, 'An act permitting the building of a dam across Rainy River,' approved May 4, 1898, and of chapter 797, of volume 33, Statutes at Large, entitled 'An act relating to a dam across Rainy River,' approved February 25, 1905, and of the various acts and provisions therein recited, is hereby authorized to construct and maintain a dam across Rainy River, Minnesota, at the place designated in said acts, subject to the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters,' approved June 21, 1906, so far as the same shall be applicable thereto, provided said dam shall be commenced within one year from the date of the passage of this act and completed on or before July 1, 1911.

"SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BEDE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

ALIEN CRIMINALS.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD newspaper articles as to alien criminals in New York and Chicago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain newspaper articles as to alien criminals in New York and Chicago. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman if they are to be taken in connection with the debate the other day when the bill was before the House?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the bill?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It is in connection with the debate the other day on the bill for the deportation of criminals, when the House refused at that time to suspend the rules.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, is this that same bill?

Mr. BENNET of New York. This is asking for the printing of certain newspaper extracts in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. It is a request for unanimous consent to print certain newspaper extracts.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have no objection to any newspaper article of any sort whatever.

The newspaper extracts are as follows:

[Washington Post, March 3, 1908.]

CHIEF KILLS RED WHO STABS HIM—ANARCHIST PLOT WIDESPREAD, CHICAGO POLICE BELIEVE—MAYOR BUSSE IS GUARDED—ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE HIM LAST WEEK KEPT SECRET—DESPERATE FIGHT AT HOME—YOUNG REFUGEE FROM KISHINEFF, WHOSE REVOLUTIONARY IDEAS WERE STIRRED BY CLUBBING OF UNEMPLOYED PARADERS, ATTACKS HEAD OF CITY'S POLICE, AND WOUNDS HIS SON AND HIS COACHMAN—"I SHOT TO KILL," SAYS SHIPPY, DESCRIBING FIGHT FOR LIFE—RAIDS ON ANARCHIST CENTERS AND ON DEAD MAN'S HOME REVEAL MUCH ANARCHISTIC LITERATURE—SISTER IDENTIFIES FERRONOT'S BODY.

CHICAGO, March 2, 1908.

Chief of Police George M. Shippy, attacked in his home, 31 Lincoln place, early to-day by Lazarus Averbuch, a Russian student, shot and killed the latter, but not until his assailant had stabbed the chief in the arm, had shot and seriously wounded Harry Shippy, a son, and had wounded James Foley, a member of the police department, detailed as driver for Chief Shippy.

The younger Shippy, who was believed at first to have been mortally injured by a bullet wound through the lung, was said at a late hour to-night to have a good chance of recovery. Neither of the other men was seriously hurt.

TRIED TO KILL MAYOR.

It became known to-night that the reds had made a desperate attempt to take the life of Fred A. Busse, mayor of Chicago, last Friday.

The attempt to kill the mayor was hushed up by the police. Two picked men of the detective department stood guard at the mayor's home, 391 Sedgewick street, to-night, one at the back door and one at the entrance. This vigil continued all night long.

The identity of the assassin, who was killed by a shot through the head, was learned late to-night from his sister, Olga, with whom he had lived for three weeks at the home of Mrs. Harry Pine, 218 Washburne avenue, in the western portion of the city.

Averbuch had been in America only three months, having come direct from Austria, whither he fled from Kishineff two years ago to escape the persecution of the Jews in that city. Through information received from the sister and from a fellow-employee in a produce commission house, where Averbuch had recently been employed, the police were able to trace Averbuch's movements and learn the views he held.

BECAUSE HE STOPPED PARADE.

It was learned that Chief Shippy's interference several weeks ago with a parade of unemployed men, headed by "Dr." Ben L. Reitman, coupled with the more recent announcement that Emma Goldman will not be allowed to speak in public in Chicago, led Averbuch to attempt to "remove" the police head in Russian "terrorist" fashion.

Averbuch's attempts upon Shippy's life to-day followed the fourth effort he had made to get at the chief. Twice on Sunday Averbuch called at Shippy's house, but was unsuccessful in finding his intended victim at home. At 7 o'clock this morning Averbuch made his third appearance, but was informed by a servant that the chief was not ready to receive callers. When Averbuch returned, at 9 o'clock, Chief Shippy was on the point of leaving for his office in the city hall. When admitted at the front door by Shippy himself, Averbuch handed the chief an envelope bearing his name and address, but the chief, having heard of the previous visits to his home, suspected that something was wrong and seized him by the arms.

The envelope, which was found later to be only a ruse to gain entrance to the house, contained only a blank sheet of paper. The quickness with which the chief acted upon his suspicion doubtless saved his life.

FOUGHT DESPERATELY.

Averbuch, though slight in build, proved in his desperation almost a match for the chief, who is much larger, and the latter found himself unable to hold his assailant and search him for weapons at the same time. He therefore called to his wife, who was in the next room, asking her to ascertain whether the man had a weapon in his pockets. Mrs. Shippy discovered a revolver in Averbuch's hip pocket, but before she could remove it he struggled loose from the grasp of the chief and, drawing a long knife, stabbed Shippy in the arm. Thereupon Chief Shippy grappled again with his assailant, who drew a revolver.

At that moment Harry Shippy, 18 years old, came rushing down the stairway to his father's aid. Averbuch fired two shots, one of which struck young Shippy, and he fell, seriously wounded by a bullet that pierced his left breast above the heart. Before he could fire again, James Foley, the chief's driver, attracted by the struggle, ran to the door and seized Averbuch. The assassin struggled loose from Foley's embrace and fired a shot which pierced Foley's hand. Then Shippy shot Averbuch in the head, and as the Russian fell dead Shippy and Foley emptied their revolvers into the body as it lay at their feet.

As the man lay dying Shippy bent over him and asked him his name and why he wanted to murder him. The stranger looked into the eyes of the chief, perfectly conscious and calm, but he would not speak.

CHIEF SHIPPY'S STORY.

Later, while Chief Shippy sat at his son's bedside in the hospital, he dictated a statement, in which he said:

"I had a premonition of this, and the attack on me came as no surprise. Therefore I have been on guard. The first I knew was the ringing at the door about 9 o'clock. I answered in person and saw standing there a man, who was evidently a Sicilian or an Armenian. He was about 26 years old. He said:

"'Is Chief Shippy in? I have an important letter for him.' With that he took out of his pocket an envelope addressed to George M. Shippy, superintendent of police, city hall, Chicago, or residence, 31 Lincoln place. I looked at the man, and instead of taking the letter I grasped his arm. With that he struggled. My wife, who had been attracted by the noise of the struggle, started downstairs. I felled the man and called to her, 'See if that man has a gun in his pocket.' My wife ran down and while I held him she placed her hands in his right overcoat pocket and got hold of a gun. She said: 'Yes, George; he has.'

"I said: 'For God's sake hold it.'

"I then grappled with the man and threw him over the telephone stand at the entrance. He released his hand from my grasp, and while my wife still held the gun, he pulled a knife from inside of his overcoat, a knife such as I never saw before. He cut across my right arm and got me. Then I fired at him. Then Foley fired. About this time my boy, Harry, started down stairs after his mother. He cried: 'Papa, I will help you.' Then I heard a shot entirely different from my gun and Foley's gun. I saw my wife was not able to keep up the unequal struggle.

"THEN I SHOT TO KILL."

"The assassin had wrenched the gun away from her. Then, as my boy grappled with him, he shot Harry just above the heart. I saw Harry fall to the stairs, and as he did so he cried: 'Papa, I'm shot; I can't help you any more.' Then I shot to kill. I had only shot to disable before, but when my boy cried that he had been shot, I shot to kill. I put one bullet through that fellow's head and another through his heart. Afterwards I found out that the fellow had fired a shot earlier than the one that had hit my boy. The second shot fired by him went through Foley's right hand, causing him to drop his revolver."

ANARCHISM RIFE IN CHICAGO.

To-day's attack gave significance to a statement made by Chief Shippy a month ago, when he commented on a report made to him by one of his subordinates of an anarchists' meeting held after the assassination of the King and Crown Prince of Portugal.

"Never in the history of Chicago," said Chief Shippy, "have anarchists and other enemies of law and order been more dangerous than they are at the present time. The police are watching all of their movements closely. You never know when they are going to break out."

Chief Shippy to-night declared that efforts to extirpate anarchists in Chicago would be prosecuted with greater vigor than ever before. "As long as I am chief of police," he said, "there never again shall be another parade of anarchists in Chicago."

BELIEVE THERE WAS A PLOT.

The attack is believed to have been the result of a conspiracy to harm officials who have been active in suppressing manifestations of anarchism in this community. Other city officials are said to have been threatened, and a police spy who recognized the dead man as a person who regularly attended anarchist meetings asserted that the man was chosen by lot to do away with not only the chief of police, but Mayor Busse as well.

The ramifications of the plot are said to extend to other cities, and to be closely connected with the killing of the Rev. Leo Heinrichs, a Roman Catholic priest, who was shot down at the altar of his church in Denver.

Following the attack, squads of police were sent into the Italian and Ghetto quarters of the city.

In a pocket of the man's coat was a small box of lozenges bearing the label of the Trowbridge Confectionery Company, Meadville, Pa. The lozenges were sent to a chemist for analysis, the police having the idea that they might contain poison. It is thought that it was the intention of the anarchist to commit suicide if arrested.

The police are firm in the belief that the attack on their chief was due to an anarchistic plot. Theories that the man may have had a personal grievance against Shippy because of an arrest or some similar affair were given up when dectectives of the department failed to recognize the body as that of any known criminal. Two members of the force asserted that they had seen the man at a meeting of anarchists about ten days ago. The testimony of the police spy confirmed this view of the case.

RAID ANARCHIST LIBRARY.

One of the first places raided by the police after the shooting was the headquarters of a society known as "The Edelstadt Group," at 427 Union street. Pictures of John Most and other anarchists were confiscated, as were also a thousand handbills announcing a series of meetings at which Emma Goldman was scheduled to speak. One of these meetings was announced for March 6, and the other for March 9. A library a short distance away was also invaded by the police and several hundred volumes and pamphlets dealing with anarchism and kindred subjects were seized.

This library was raided after President William McKinley was shot at Buffalo. At the time many volumes were seized by the police and destroyed.

The attack on the chief is believed to have been inspired by the recent activity of the Chicago police following the killing of Rev. Leo Heinrichs, a Roman Catholic monk, who was shot by an anarchist in Denver while he was administering the sacrament.

ACTIVE AGAINST ANARCHISM.

Immediately following the tragedy in Denver attempts to trace the crime to a conspiracy hatched in Chicago were begun. The local police discovered that the society of Italians formed here had been issuing inflammatory literature aimed at clericals, and also that several local clergymen had received threatening letters. Yesterday while the funeral of Father Leo was being held in Paterson, N. J., details of police guarded several of the Roman Catholic churches here. Especial precautions were taken in the Italian quarter, where policemen in citizens' clothes scrutinized every worshiper as the congregations entered. Later the officers moved to the altars and stood guard over the priests as they conducted the services.

In addition to these measures, all known anarchists in the city, among them Emma Goldman, were warned that they would not be allowed to make addresses in public. So far as is known none attempted to disobey this order, and no arrests were made of followers of the cult. The documents sent out by the Italian organization were carefully worded and an examination of them showed that prosecutions based thereon might have failed because of technical shortcomings.

GAVE MAYOR A SCARE.

Mayor Busse had an exciting interview with an officeseeker a few minutes after the executive had returned to his office from the Shippy home, whither he had gone on being informed of the affray. The stranger, who was shabbily dressed, was waiting outside the mayor's office in the city hall, and as the mayor advanced extended his hand. The mayor, who was pale and nervous after the experience of his chief of police, declined the grasp and eyed the man closely.

"I want a job, and I am not here to ask you for anything more. But if I don't get a job there will be trouble," said the man.

The mayor immediately ordered the man out of the building, and the latter, after gazing angrily at him for a moment, descended to the main floor and walked away.

Mayor Busse explained later that this person had been calling on him and asking for a position every day for some time. To-day, however, was the first time the man had threatened to create trouble. The incident following so closely upon the tragedy at Chief Shippy's home, caused some excitement in the city hall, and several heads of departments issued orders to their clerks and secretaries to admit no stranger to their offices on any pretext.

It is said that Mayor Busse will issue an order prohibiting all street meetings. The order will be made general and include religious as well as political gatherings, it being asserted that inflammatory speeches are often made at gatherings held on street corners under the guise of revival meetings. By making the edict sweeping it is thought that objections to it on the ground of discrimination will be forestalled.

GRAND JURY TO ACT.

A sweeping investigation of the anarchist movement in Chicago by the March grand jury, which was impaneled to-day, will be undertaken, according to State's Attorney Healy.

"The investigation will not stop with the dupes who undertake assassinations, but will go back to the instigators," said Mr. Healy. "We shall follow the precedent established at the time of the Haymarket riots. There is no specific statute on the subject of anarchy in Illinois, but if it can be shown that the attempt to kill was the result of an agreement, the conspiracy statute will apply. Instigators can also be held as principals."

CROWD AT MONK'S FUNERAL—THOUSANDS SEE BURIAL OF FATHER LEO, ANARCHIST'S VICTIM.

PATERSON, N. J., March 2, 1908.

An immense throng attended the funeral to-day at St. Bonaventure's Church, this city, of its former pastor, Father Leo Heinrich, who was assassinated in St. Elizabeth's Church, Denver, Sunday morning, a week ago.

Thousands of men and women who were unable to enter the church stood for two hours in the rain, until they saw the casket containing the body of the dead priest carried from the church.

Mass was celebrated by Rev. Father Edward Bleckee, provincial of the Franciscan order, assisted by priests who were classmates of Father Heinrich. Bishop John J. O'Connor was present. The eulogy was delivered by Dean McNulty, pastor of St. John's Church, a warm friend of the dead priest. He said that the lesson to be learned from the murder is that "our societies ought to labor to counteract the evil lessons taught by the anarchists and socialists. Instead of dinners and euchers and games, let us have lectures on moral and social topics. Let us be able to answer and to convert the wild agitators."

Many societies formed in procession, which followed the body to the Cemetery of the Holy Sepulchre, where 100 priests chanted the office of burial.

PROPAGANDA FROM CHICAGO—ANARCHIST PAPER PRINTED THERE CIRCULATED IN KANSAS CITY.

KANSAS CITY, MO., March 2, 1908.

Anarchist leaders in Chicago are apparently attempting to extend their influence in this city. During the past few weeks members of the Croatian settlement in Kansas City, Kans., have received by mail copies of a Croatian anarchistic paper published in Chicago. Many of those who received copies of the paper formerly worked in the Chicago packing houses and were transferred to Kansas City. They all declared that they did not order the paper.

The publication contains articles attacking the Catholic Church and all forms of government.

The Rev. M. Dovorin Krempotic, pastor of the Church of St. John the Baptist, of which the Croatians are members, said yesterday:

"There have been some attempts of the anarchists to work in my parish. They have met with little success, however, and have caused me no trouble."

EMMA GOLDMAN'S COMMENT—"THEY ALWAYS SAY 'ANARCHIST' WHEN SOMEBODY SHOOTS."

SPRINGFIELD, MO., March 2, 1908.

Emma Goldman, anarchist lecturer, arrived to-night from St. Louis, and, hearing of the attack on Chief of Police Shippy, of Chicago, said:

"Of course the man had to be an anarchist if he tried to kill anybody. Somebody kills somebody else, or tries to shoot him, and the world, the officers, and the newspapers cry 'Anarchist.'

"The dispatches say the dead man is unidentified, and yet the officers call him an anarchist.

"I know nothing whatever about the affair, but I would be willing to guarantee that the man was not an anarchist, but some fanatic or somebody with a private grudge against Shippy."

Emma Goldman lectured to-night in spite of Mayor Blaine's effort to prevent the meeting, the city attorney advising him that under the law he could not interfere.

HUNT OUT ALL REDS—SECRETARY STRAUS ORDERS WAR AGAINST ANARCHISTS—DRIVE THEM FROM LAND—LAW GIVES HIM POWER TO DEPORT FOES OF GOVERNMENT—IMMIGRANT INSPECTORS AND COMMISSIONERS INSTRUCTED TO CONFER WITH POLICE AND OBTAIN EVIDENCE UPON WHICH THESE UNDESIRABLES, AS WELL AS ALIEN CRIMINALS, MAY BE SENT TO THEIR NATIVE COUNTRIES—STATUTE LIMITS ACTION—WAR ON ANARCHISTS.

Secretary Straus orders immigration officials to consult the police in their jurisdictions and take measures for deportation of avowed anarchists and convict aliens.

Chicago police arrest several suspects in connection with the attempt to kill Chief Shippy. Mayor and Federal officials confer on ridding that city of advocates of violence.

Conference between Immigration Commissioner Watchorn and Police Commissioner Bingham, of New York, to be held there to-day.

Police in other cities active in hunting out haunts of the anarchist groups.

Murderer of Father Leo, at Denver, pronounced sane.

Secretary Straus, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, yesterday issued a sweeping order to all commissioners of immigration and immigrant inspectors in charge directing them to confer with the police in their respective jurisdictions with a view to "securing the cooperation of the police and detective forces in an effort to rid the country of alien anarchists and criminals falling within the law relating to deportation."

Commisioner Watchorn, at New York, will confer with Police Commissioner Bingham to-day. The Chicago authorities, roused by the attack on Chief of Police Shippy, are acting vigorously. The police of Pittsburg and several other cities had begun to proceed along the lines of Commissioner Straus's order before it was issued. The order follows:

To all commissioners of immigration and immigrant inspectors in charge:

It is hereby directed that, with a view to promptly obtaining definite information with regard to alien anarchists and criminals located in the United States, you shall confer fully with the chief of police or the chief of the secret service of the city in which you are located, furnishing such official with detailed information with regard to the meaning of the term "anarchist" as used in the immigration act of February 20, 1907, and with regard to the inhibition of that statute against aliens of the criminal classes, explaining the powers and limitations imposed by said statute upon the immigration officials with respect to such persons.

POWER TO DEPORT.

You should call to the attention of the chief of police or chief of the secret service the definition of "anarchist" contained in sections 2 and 38 of the act of February 20, 1907, and the provisions of section 2, placing within the excluded classes "persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude," pointing out that if any such person is found within the United States within three years after landing or entry therein he is amenable to deportation under the provisions of section 21 of said act.

The cooperation of said officials should be requested, making it clear that in order that any particular anarchist or criminal may be deported evidence must be furnished showing (1) that the person in question is an alien, subject to the immigration acts; (2) that he is an anarchist or criminal as defined in the statute; (3) the date of his arrival in the United States, which must be within three years of the date of his arrest; (4) the name of the vessel or of the transportation line by which he came, if possible, and (5) the name of the country whence he came, the details with respect to the last three items being kept at the various ports of entry in such a manner as to be available if information is furnished with respect to the anarchist's name, the date of his arrival, and the port of entry.

It is desired that the above-indicated steps shall be taken at once and that no proper effort shall be spared to secure and retain the cooperation of the local police and detective forces in an effort to rid the country of alien anarchists and criminals falling within the provisions of the statute relating to deportation.

THE EXCLUDED CLASSES.

Section 2 of the immigration act reads as follows:

"That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States: Persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; polygamists, or persons who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy; anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all government, or of all forms of law, or the assassination of public officials."

Section 30 of the immigration act, referred to in Mr. Straus's order, reads as follows:

"That no person who disbelieves in or who is opposed to all organized government, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching such disbelief in or opposition to all organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, shall be permitted to enter the United States or any territory or place subject to the jurisdiction thereof. This section shall be enforced by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe.

"That any person who knowingly aids or assists any such person to enter the United States or any Territory or place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or who connives or conspires with any person or persons to allow, procure, or permit any such person to enter therein, except pursuant to such rules and regulations made by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both."

THREE YEARS' LIMIT.

Section 21 of the act of February 20, 1907, referred to, is as follows:

"That in case the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall be satisfied that an alien has been found in the United States in violation of this act, or that an alien is subject to deportation under the provisions of this act or of any law of the United States, he shall cause such alien within the period of three years after landing or entry therein to be taken into custody and returned to the country whence he came, as provided by section 20 of this act, and a failure or refusal on the part of the masters, agents, owners, or consignees of vessels to comply with the order of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to take on board, guard safely, and return to the country whence he came any alien ordered to be deported under the provisions of this act shall be punished by the imposition of the penalties prescribed in section 19 of this act: Provided, That when, in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the mental or physical condition of such alien is such as to require personal care and attendance, he may employ a suitable person for that purpose, who shall accompany such alien to his or her final destination, and the expense incident to such service shall be defrayed in a like manner."

WAS ANARCHIST TOOL—CHICAGO POLICE FIND AVERBUCH ACTED UNDER ORDERS—MAYOR BUSSE "SENTENCED"—YOUNG MAN WHOM CHIEF OF POLICE KILLED ATTENDED MEETINGS OF REDS WHEN HE WAS SUPPOSED TO BE GOING TO NIGHT SCHOOL—CONTEMPLATED SUICIDE AFTER HE HAD BEEN CHOSEN TO EXECUTE DECREE.

CHICAGO, March 3, 1908.

That Lazarus Averbuch, in attempting to assassinate Chief of Police Shippy, carried out a commission intrusted to him by a group of Chicago anarchists was declared by Assistant Chief of Police Schuettler to-night to have been proved beyond a doubt. The discovery was made to-night just as the police were about to accept the theory that the young anarchist acted upon his own impulse and that the attempt was not the result of conspiracy.

The group of anarchists also plotted, according to information in the hands of the authorities, to assassinate Mayor A. B. Busse and Capt. P. D. O'Brien, of the detective bureau. The principals in the plot have not yet been discovered, but it was said that Averbuch was picked to execute the order of death at a meeting of anarchists which he attended last Thursday night.

It was on that night, upon his return to the home of his sister, Olga Averbuch, 218 Washburne avenue, that the young Russian contemplated suicide, as described by her to the police. Averbuch, instead of going to night school, as his sister declared he did, is said to have been in nightly communication with a band of radical revolutionists, and it was at a meeting of these men that Averbuch was chosen to "remove" the police head.

ASKED WHERE CHIEF LIVED.

Averbuch is said to have left his home on Friday morning following his acceptance of the commission and to have never returned. He went to his place of employment at the commission house on South Water street, and in conversation with his fellow-employees made numerous inquiries regarding the chief of police. He is said to have talked violently concerning the order which prohibited the parade of the "unemployed" last January.

"Where does the chief live?" Averbuch is reported to have asked one of his associates. "I'd like to find out what kind of a home he has got."

Later one of the men informed Averbuch that he had looked up the address and gave it to the young Russian written on a scrap of paper. At the time Averbuch's interest in the police official failed to raise suspicion, but, being recalled after the attempt upon the life of the chief, it was the clew which led to the identification of the would-be slayer.

CLEW IN WOMAN'S HANDS.

"We have several important clews," said the assistant chief to-night, "which we believe will lead to the arrest of the conspirators. Olga Averbuch persistently refuses to give us any information. We are seeking the young woman, Rosa Stern, among others, who lived with Averbuch and his sister."

The net result of police activity during the day and evening was the rounding up of nine suspects. Three arrests, which the police considered important, were made late in the afternoon. A man who gave his name as Harry Goldstein, and who is said to be an agent of the Edelstadt Society, an anarchistic organization at 427 Union street, was taken into custody at Halsted and West Fourteenth streets while distributing handbills of a rabid, anarchistic nature. Two other suspects, whose names were withheld, were arrested and subjected to a rigid examination at the city hall. One was taken at Halsted and West Taylor streets and the other at Washington street and Fifth avenue, in the loop district.

A clew secured early in the day led to the arrest of Isadore Maron, who for a time was believed to be the "curly-haired" companion of Averbuch, the would-be assassin, as described to the police by Olga Averbuch, sister of the dead man. This was later decided to be not the case, but Maron admitted sufficient association with Chicago anarchists to warrant his being placed in a cell.

MYSTERY BEHIND ARREST.

Another clew led to the arrest of M. Abramovitz, 20 years old, a Russian, a student at the University of Chicago night school, and employed as a printer in the daytime. His "sweating" by the police lasted until late in the evening. The others under arrest were held more because of their affiliation with anarchistic societies than from any expectation of connecting them with the attempted assassination of the police chief.

Harry Goldstein was hurried, after his arrest, to the office of Assistant Chief Schuettler, and there personally examined by Mayor Busse. Much secrecy was thrown around the capture of the man, and the police would not say what information had been found to cause his arrest.

"This is the man for whom we have been looking since yesterday," declared a police official, who refused to make any further statement. Emphasis to the importance of the arrest was given by Mayor Busse's act in taking personal charge of the "sweat-box" examination. Goldstein was captured in a raid at Halsted and West Fourteenth streets.

"CATECHISM" OF BLASPHEMY.

Literature teeming with blasphemy, which is used by anarchists as catechisms for children in lieu of the religious instruction, was unearthed to-day in quarters of anarchists in different parts of the city.

It is reported that the police will attempt to cause the summary deportation, without trial, of all avowed anarchists.

The situation which developed into the tragedy of yesterday was thus discussed by Chief Shippy:

"A number of attacks were made on the police at a meeting in Brand's Hall recently. Several of the speakers might just as well have told their deluded hearers to go out and murder every policeman they saw. That was what one of the speakers said he wished he could do—go out and kill every policeman and throw their bodies in the lake to the fish. Lucy Parsons spoke at this meeting, attacking the police bitterly.

"TAKING LIFE IS SERIOUS.

"It is the suggestion that causes these poor, deluded men to go out with their knives and revolvers to kill. Taking human life is a mighty serious business. I realized that when I shot in self-defense and in defense of my wife and son.

"The Chicago anarchists also were bitter against me for the reason that I interfered with the parade that was to have been held several weeks ago. I am certain that I took the right course on that occasion. They held such a parade in Philadelphia, and three policemen were killed."

Frank Zajicek was arrested to-day charged with sending a threatening letter to a Roman Catholic clergyman, Procopius Nuzil, a prior of the Benedictine Fathers. The prisoner, who is 38 years old, and lives at 584 Blue Island avenue, on the borders of the Ghetto district, admitted sending a demand for $1,000 to the priest, according to the police.

TO RID NEW YORK OF REDS—THREATS AGAINST ARCHBISHOP FARLEY ALARM HIS SUBORDINATES.

NEW YORK, March 3, 1908.

The order of Secretary Straus, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, for the deportation of such alien anarchists and criminals as the law can reach will be enforced promptly and vigorously by the Federal authorities here, working in harmony with the municipal police.

Commissioner of Immigration Watchorn is keenly alive to the situation, and his subordinates are already schooled in what is expected of them. United States District Attorney Stimson said to-night that the matter had not yet been brought to his attention officially, but he intimated that no time would be lost by the Federal officers in complying with the instructions of the Department.

Police Commissioner Bingham said that the local police were exercising now every precautionary measure possible, and that he would continue to do his best with the limited resources at his command. The commissioner has repeatedly urged the need of a larger force, especially in the detective branch of the department.

PLAN JOINT ACTION.

It is known that conferences between several Federal authorities will be held to-morrow, and it is understood that a representative of the Immigrant Service will confer with Commissioner Bingham to plan joint action.

Despite qualified denials, justified by the secret nature of the work, it is known that a systematic campaign against those suspected of anarchistic sympathies has been quietly waged in this city for months. Special detectives are scattered throughout the Wall street section, the neighborhoods of the wealthy receive special attention, and the haunts of the suspected are closely watched. While little appears on the surface, it is known that any attempt at a lawless demonstration would be ridden down roughshod and that a warm reception awaits the avowed anarchist from other parts who, in an ill-advised moment, may turn his steps New Yorkward.

THREAT AGAINST ARCHBISHOP.

A report that Archbishop Farley, head of the Catholic Church in New York, had been threatened by anarchists reached Commissioner Bingham to-day, but he would not confirm it. The archbishop's subordinates, however, have been in communication with the police in an effort to hunt down the authors.

In a formal statement to-night General Bingham declared:

"The only foundation for the story concerning a threat made against Archbishop Farley is an anonymous letter received at police headquarters six months ago, in which his name and the names of other prominent men were mentioned. This was a typical 'bug' letter, and no attention was paid to it. Every prominent man receives scores of such letters, and if any attention was paid to them the recipients would never have any peace of mind.

"There is no truth in the assertion that the force of patrolmen has been increased in the financial district because of threats made against men doing business there. Scores of 'bug' letters are received by the police department every day in the week."

Of the additional police assigned to the financial district, the commissioner said:

WILL HANDLE ANARCHISTS.

"The force has been increased about twenty men, and it is partly true that they are there on account of a circular letter. Here again is another case which proves that if I had a secret-service fund I could do good work in that line. The first thing to do is to get good men in the service, and they are not in this city to-day. In fact, I only know of two men who I think could do the work, and they are not in the city. We will take all precautions necessary to handle all anarchists, and we will see that very few come to this city."

To the question whether he had received any threatening letters recently the commissioner replied:

"No; I have not lately, but one of my deputies has."

He declined to say to which deputy he referred, or to be more explicit.

Archbishop Farley was out of town to-day.

NO EVIDENCE OF TROUBLE COMING.

Police Commissioner Bingham said there was no evidence that the western anarchists had eastern connections.

"Since the murder of Father Leo," he said, "and in connection with that crime, or the attempt on the life of Chief of Police Shippy, of Chicago, nothing has occurred here to indicate that these western anarchists have any New York connections, or that prominent men here are likely to suffer.

"What may happen no one can tell. I may be the next one myself; but so far there is nothing in the local situation to give us reason to believe there is danger of an outbreak here."

THREATEN WOMAN TEACHER—SCURRILOUS BLACK-HAND LETTERS SENT ADVOCATE OF EQUAL PAY.

NEW YORK, March 3, 1908.

Miss Grace C. Stracham, assistant superintendent of public schools and president of the Interborough Teachers' Association, who has been especially active in the fight for equal pay for woman teachers, was a visitor to-day to the Smith street police headquarters, in Brooklyn, where she had a conference with Acting Captain Kuhne, of the detective bureau, in reference to some Black Hand and scurrilous letters which had been sent to her recently.

One letter was ornamented with pictures of a dagger, skull, and crossbones. It read:

"We see you are trying to make taxes higher by going to Albany to get more money for wimmin teachers and not for men. You are nothing but a fool to go in with a man like McCarren to win pay like men. Beware. Your a marked woman. You will surely die if you don't stop the equal-pay fight. Fire and bombs. Warning. Sent by committee. Black Hand."

The other letters were full of insulting language and epithets. Miss Stracham said that she was not frightened at the communications, but that she would like the police to discover the authors, if possible. Captain Kuhne advised her to take the letters to the post-office authorities.

SEARCH ON AT PITTSBURG—ALL PERSONS OF ANARCHISTIC TENDENCIES BEING CLOSELY WATCHED.

PITTSBURG, March 3, 1908.

Following the attempted assassination of Chief of Police Shippy, of Chicago, yesterday, the local authorities are taking vigorous measures to prevent outbreaks of a similar nature here.

All known persons of anarchistic tendencies are being closely watched, and renewed efforts are being directed toward breaking up foreign blackmailing organizations.

Superintendent McQuaide says he is pleased that the Chicago assailant was killed, and that he will endeavor to secure cooperation with the police chiefs of other cities to assist in getting rid of the undesirable foreign element.

"Should his life have been spared and the case come to trial, riots, bloodshed, and possibly many deaths from violence would have resulted," Superintendent McQuaide says: "There is no question in my mind that the attempt upon Chief Shippy's life was the direct result of the assassination of the Denver priest. There seems to be but one remedy for the anarchist situation—that is, to secure revision of the immigration, particularly the deportation laws. The moment a foreigner announces himself to have, or can be proven to have, anarchistic tendencies, he should be immediately sent back to his native land."

TWO CHURCHES GUARDED—THREATS HAVE BEEN MADE TO DESTROY PHILADELPHIA STRUCTURES.

PHILADELPHIA, March 3, 1908.

Two of the biggest Roman Catholic churches in Philadelphia were to-day put under strict police surveillance, and guards of plain-clothes men surrounded them to-night, because of threats of anarchists to destroy them. The churches are St. Ann's and the Chapel of the Holy Name, both in the northeastern section of the city. The parochial school of the Chapel of the Holy Name has practically been closed for the last two days, because of the report of the plot.

MURDERER OF MONK SANE—FOUR EXPERTS FIND THAT DENVER ANARCHIST IS MENTALLY SOUND.

DENVER, COLO., March 3, 1908.

Guiseppe Alia, the slayer of Father Leo Heinrichs, is declared absolutely sane in a report submitted to District Attorney A. Stidger to-day by four experts in mental diseases, who examined the prisoner for several hours.

The physicians agreed that Alia has no mental delusions whatever.

[Chicago Tribune, March 3, 1908.]

FIND HIS ASSOCIATES.

Everything goes to show that the would-be murderer of Chief Shippy was a thoroughgoing anarchist. The place and the time of the attempt indicate that he was not thinking of his own personal safety. If only he could kill he was prepared, like the desperate Russian bomb throwers, to be killed.

It is for the police to discover, and they have every incentive to do so, who this man is and who his associates were, and thus find out the motive that actuated him. After the assassination of the Rev. Leo Heinrichs at Denver by an Italian anarchist Chief Shippy was quoted as saying that Emma Goldman would not be permitted to speak at a meeting soon to be held here. That may have had some connection with yesterday's crime, or it may have been inspired by the action of the police in guarding some Roman Catholic priests.

Or this attempt may be a verification of the statement made in the Tribune three weeks ago on the strength of what it considered trustworthy information that the anarchists had changed their plan of campaign. It was said then that there were to be no more Haymarket outrages, but that a policy of individual assassination had been resolved on. Here and there, one by one, the men whom the anarchists looked on as special enemies were to be picked off. One of the city papers said then there were no anarchists in Chicago. Perhaps it will change its mind.

The assassin is beyond the reach of justice, but when the police shall have unearthed his associates they will have found a desperate and dangerous gang. It may be impossible to connect any of them directly with yesterday's crime, but if there are any of them who have only recently come to the country it should be possible to deport them. The law excludes anarchists. If they can not be deported, they will have to be the subjects of continued police vigilance.

The denunciation of anarchy from many pulpits on Sunday is followed by the attempt to murder the chief of police. That should only make the community more determined that anarchy shall be suppressed and should make the police more zealous about crushing it out. One Haymarket experience should be enough. It may well be that the great majority of the Chicago anarchists are violent only with their tongues and do not dare to risk their necks. But there are others more indifferent to consequences who, when their minds are inflamed by the wild speeches of their associates, are ready for any crime.

The police must keep an eye on them all. They must look out for newcomers, and when they arrive find out whether they have any right to be in the country, and if not, have them sent out. The immigration officials have let in too many anarchists. They must be more vigilant or there will be an increase in anarchistic crime. But, irrespective of what they do, Chicago must deal resolutely and firmly with anarchy within its limits.

It is said that the knife and revolver carried by the dead anarchist never had been used before, and probably were bought recently. If the council had passed the ordinance to stop the indiscriminate sale of firearms when the Tribune first called on it to do so, it would have been more difficult for that man to arm himself. Perhaps now the council will pass the ordinance.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18347 (the post-office appropriation bill) with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] occupy some time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply disappointed at the failure of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to include in this bill legislation to carry into effect the recommendation of the Postmaster-General for a parcels post. If the committee had seen fit to confine the system strictly to rural routes, I should have been satisfied with that, and it is difficult to see how any Member of this body, who represents a constituency that is even partly rural or who has the interests of our country people at heart, could have opposed it. For this service the scale of charges would be, according to the departmental recommendation, 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound up to 11 pounds, which is the limit in weight proposed by the Department, so that the total charges for a package weighing 11 pounds would be 25 cents. The establishment of this system would be a great boon to our rural people. It would go hand in hand with our present rural mail-delivery system, utilizing the machinery already provided for that system, using the same men, the same horses, and the same vehicles, or certainly not more expensive ones than are now provided for the delivery of the rural mail. It would be self-sustaining and self-supporting and would enable us from its profits to still further increase the pay of our rural carriers without taking a cent from the public Treasury. It would greatly increase the comfort and convenience of life in the country. The same principle of economy that is the basis of our rural mail delivery is the basis of this proposed parcels-post delivery.

Instead of forcing a large number of men living along rural routes to hitch up their horses and go to town, thus losing time from their work, to carry fruits, vegetables, or poultry to sell in town or to bring back purchases from the merchant in town, the carrier would deliver packages of each character along his route, those from the farmer as well as those to him. It can be readily seen that the saving in time and money to all classes who would obtain the benefits of the service would be almost incalculable.

So far from injuring the trade of our retail merchants in the small towns and even in the rural districts, this system would improve and extend that trade, for the small merchant would always have a cheap, prompt, and reliable delivery service for his own use. The objection is sometimes urged against the proposition that it is paternalistic in its character; that it is no part of the Government's duty to engage in the delivery of parcels, or in the transportation of merchandise of any kind. The same argument was urged against the establishment of our Post-Office Department itself. In that case the argument has reduced itself to such a practical absurdity that few, if any, now make it, and its ridiculousness is now universally conceded. But I would like to inquire what is the difference in principle between transportation by the Government of sheets of paper, either printed or written, and the transportation by the Government of other articles of merchandise that are just as important and just as necessary as newspapers or magazines or letters for the development of our civilization and the improvement of the conditions of life among our people. If there is any difference, it is so finespun, so hairsplitting, that I can not perceive it,

Mr. Chairman, for the past year or more I have made a somewhat extended investigation into this subject. I have written to the post-office departments of many foreign countries where this system is now being successfully operated and have obtained the reports of these departments upon it. I now have in my desk the reports from Great Britain, Germany, France, and New Zealand, and I have yet to find an instance where the system has failed or has not been eminently successful. In all of these countries it works satisfactorily, pays its own way, and is a great blessing to all classes, to the small merchant as well as the rural citizens. In all of them the system is extended and improved year by year, and no man suggests a backward step. For several years past I have earnestly and actively, both in public speech and private conversation, advocated the establishment of this system in the United States. I took that position long in advance of any recommendation of our Post-Office Department and long in advance of the indorsement of the proposition by some of the powerful organizations that now support it. The Farmers' Union, a powerful and influential organization of the farmers of the country, with the flower of its strength in the South, has indorsed it, and its locals everywhere are urging the Members of this House to support it. Its position on this great question is so true to the real interests of its members that it is a splendid evidence of the wise and far-sighted leadership with which that organization is blessed, as well as an encouraging proof of the quickness and unanimity with which our country people are beginning to perceive their true interests.

Though our cities are flourishing and may grow still richer and still larger, yet, after all, the mainstay and backbone of our country is the great mass of our great rural population, and no statesmanship can ever be very comprehensive or wise that fails to recognize this great fact and to do all in its power to build up the rural sections, to make conditions there more favorable, and life there more pleasant and more worth living. Entertaining these sentiments, it is with deep regret that I am forced to the conclusion that there is little hope to obtain this legislation at the present session of Congress. If the provisions for a rural parcels post had been included in the bill reported by the committee, the situation would be vastly different and the prospects for securing the legislation would be bright. If the point of order that new legislation can not be carried on an appropriation bill had been insisted on, how easy it would have been for this powerful committee of the House to have obtained from the still more powerful Committee on Rules a special rule declaring that during the consideration of this bill the provisions of a parcels post should be in order in spite of the usual point of order. Almost every day this proceeding is resorted to whenever the House or any powerful committee wishes to do something forbidden by the ordinary and usual rules of this body. Only the other day, during the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, resort was had to this procedure to enable this body to grant a meritorious and much needed increase of pay to the enlisted men of our Army after the point of order had been successfully urged against the increase. At the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was passed under a kind of special omnibus rule, abrogating at one blow scores of points of order that had been successfully made against numerous increases in salaries and appropriations carried in that bill.

It is well known that the Committee on Rules rarely, if ever, turns a deaf ear to appeals of this character, if the appeal comes from some one of the great committees of this House. That it would turn anything but a deaf ear, even if that, to almost any individual Member can not be doubted. Doubtless, the effort will be made, when we begin to consider the bill under the five-minute rule, to offer an amendment to provide a parcels-post system confined to the rural routes, but that the point of order will be insisted upon is certain, and to hope for relief from the Committee on Rules is vain. Therefore, the proceeding will not only be utterly hopeless, but utterly useless.

As business is transacted in this House there is little hope that bills providing for changes in existing law, and regularly referred to the proper committees, can pass, or can even receive consideration. However meritorious, they are doomed to sleep in the committee room or on some uncalled Calendar, some unsounded docket. The hope that they will ever wake up is even fainter than usual in a session immediately preceding a Presidential election, when the Members of both Houses are so anxious to get home to look after their political fences that they are, as at the present session, proceeding to get ready to do so with the speed of the whirlwind, even if, in order to do so, they leave unacted upon and undisposed of the stirring and strenuous recommendations of the President upon great questions of governmental policy and proposed legislative remedies for existing evils that have been brought to their attention by President Roosevelt in the most vigorous and aggressive fashion ever witnessed in our political history.

When the President can not command consideration from his own party in this body for the great questions he has presented to it, who else may hope to obtain it?

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I confess that I am disappointed at the failure of the Post-Office Committee to include in this bill provisions for a parcels-post system, limited to rural routes. If the committee had found the point of order insisted on, it could have easily overcome that difficulty by an appeal to the Committee on Rules. No individual member of this body can, however, hope to follow that road successfully. The responsibility for the failure of the committee and of this House to follow the recommendation of the Republican Postmaster-General must and can only rest on the shoulders of the Republican party, for that party, through its majority membership on the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, has declined to pursue the only practicable road by which consideration could be obtained for this most meritorious measure. I do not see how the Republican party can hope to escape this responsibility. It certainly can not do so.

If my friends on the other side of this Chamber undertake to tell the farmers of this land, who earnestly favor this legislation, that they did not have time to consider it during the present session, will they not be met with the question, "On what more important measure could you spend your time?"

If our Republican friends undertake to say that they could not consider, in connection with this bill, the merits of the proposition, although it was earnestly recommended to them by the Postmaster-General, because of the point of order, will not the reply be aptly made: "Why is it that when an increase of pay for the enlisted men of our Army is proposed, or when salaries are to be raised, or when legislation on any subject is really and sincerely desired by you, that you can brush aside the point of order like it was a troublesome but harmless insect, but when it comes to the consideration of this great measure in the interest of our rural people you then find the point of order not only harmful and dangerous, but also unconquerable and omnipotent?"

To-day I can do little more than express my sorrow and disappointment that the time between now and the assembling of the next national party in power is so short, and the point of order is so strong, that, between the two, there is little hope for the consideration of this measure at the present session, and to venture the prophesy that before many more sessions shall have passed an enlightened public sentiment will force its consideration.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, my colleague [Mr. SIMS], one hour.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the matter I rise to discuss is germane to the subject-matter of the bill now before the House, not the bill itself, but an amendment thereto. I propose to discuss the bill H. R. 67, introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], the object of which bill is to prevent the use of the United States mails, the telegraph, and telephone in transacting cotton future sales and purchase on the exchanges of the country where no actual delivery or acceptance of cotton is contemplated.

Mr. Chairman, I do not rise here to hurl abuse at cotton operators as such or members of the cotton exchanges as such, but for the purpose of discussing the relation of cotton future dealings to actual cotton business, either in the way of producers or manufacturers or such middlemen as are necessary to the transaction of actual commodity cotton business. It has been often stated as one of the reasons for the existence and operations upon these exchanges that they were an aid to actual cotton transactions; that they were an aid to the producers and the handlers of actual cotton, to middlemen, and to the manufacturers of cotton goods. If that is true, I should not object to these transactions nor attempt to prevent or hamper them in any way; and I know the gentleman from Texas, in introducing this bill, had no purpose in his mind to prevent the doing of anything that will be on the whole an aid to the legitimate cotton industry in all its branches and forms. Consequently there is no soreness on my part, there is no spirit of getting even with somebody or making unjust warfare upon any institution anywhere; but I want to weigh, investigate, and come to a conclusion whether or not the cotton exchanges of the country as a whole are a benefit or an injury to the cotton industry.

I charge, from such limited investigation as I have been able to make, that upon the whole they are as operated an injury and should not be permitted the use of the United States mails in furtherance of this so-called "business," which in the aggregate is an injury to the industry that it is claimed it will benefit.

I would feel a great hesitancy in undertaking to discuss this matter in this House, knowing as little as I do about it, if I was not convinced that if not a majority at least a large number of my colleagues on both sides know a great deal less even than I do about it. But the cotton growers of the South in organized capacity have demanded legislation to relieve themselves from the situation which they claim is really a detriment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman why this bill should not apply also to wool and grain of all kinds?

Mr. SIMS. As far as wool is concerned, it can not apply, because wool is not dealt in upon any exchange for future delivery on margin as is cotton.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What about applying it to grain?

Mr. SIMS. I know of no reason why it should not apply to grain; but I am looking after an interest of my own section, and as my section does not produce any large quantity of grain that is handled upon any exchange I will not discuss this matter as relates to grain, but shall confine myself to the cotton industry and not to other industries.

I start out with the charge that fully 90 or 95 per cent of all the transactions recorded upon the cotton exchange of New York are purely speculative, and in no way logically connected with cotton transactions in fact, and that this 95 per cent of transactions give color and effect to these operations as a whole, and should be judged accordingly. The dealing upon cotton exchanges in what is known as "futures" is really dealing in fluctuations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the gentleman the facts upon which he bases this statement of the percentage?

Mr. SIMS. I have. I make the statement and will back it up with the proof—that 95 per cent of them are in no way related to the actual cotton industry in any form, either to the growers, or to the merchants who take it from the farmer, or to the middleman who handles it, or to the exporter or spinner. Then, if there is not more than 5 per cent of these transactions that in any way benefit the cotton industry and 95 per cent that are detrimental, should we longer tolerate the use of the United States mails in the maintenance of the so-called "business" which is a maintenance of an evil, judged of in every way that it may be considered.

Mr. Chairman, I am ready to admit that investment—speculation—as a rule, tends to support the values of the things speculated in. I am not here to fight speculation as such—investment speculation—but the so-called "speculation" that its necessary effect is that one party loses what another one gains. [Applause.] It is no legitimate speculation for me to buy 500 bales of cotton for May delivery through a cotton exchange from my friend [Mr. CLARK], who sells me the 500 bales, and the market goes against Mr. CLARK, and I take his $500 put up as margin and put it in my pocket by reason of the market going down. In such a transaction he loses what I gain, and I gain what he loses. That is the result of speculation in fluctuations.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me one question about this business. Would it not be a good deal better, and in the end cheaper, for us to go into the lobby and put up $500 as a bet as to cotton going up and down in the market than to go to these exchanges and pay these fellows a commission for this species of gambling?

Mr. SIMS. In the transaction I have just explained between Mr. CLARK and myself the cotton exchange takes the margin money, which is simply and purely a stake, and turns it over to the winner, less the commission charges for holding the stakes in the form or name of margins and going through the details of this so-called "business."

Mr. LOVERING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. LOVERING. Do I understand that such a sale or transaction as the gentleman has described between himself and Mr. CLARK is included among the 5 per cent or the 95 per cent?

Mr. SIMS. The 95 per cent.

Mr. LOVERING. It is included among the 95 per cent?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. I am seeking to explain what is called "speculation," but what is, in fact, gambling.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say that he felt justified in buying 500 bales of cotton and putting up $500 as a margin?

Mr. SIMS. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman to say he thought it was a perfectly legitimate transaction to buy 500 bales of cotton, deliverable on the 1st of May, on which he would pay a certain amount of money, a certain margin——

Mr. SIMS. No; I did not say that.

Mr. MADDEN. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. SIMS. I am undertaking to explain the difference between real speculation and what is here called speculation, but which, in fact, is wagering or gambling. Now, suppose I should buy 500 bales of cotton from my friend Mr. CLARK. He sells to me as a grower, or he has bought it from somebody else. He sells it to me for a price that yields a profit to him. I hold it a while and I sell it to my friend and colleague [Mr. GARRETT] for a profit. He holds it a while and sells it to another friend for a profit, and so on down. It may go through a hundred hands and be sold a hundred times, for a profit in every instance, and all legitimate speculation and not gambling, and every man has made something and no man has lost anything. That kind of speculation is a benefit to the cotton crop. When the vast number of millions of bales of cotton that are gathered in September, October, November, and December are thrown on the market, there is a greater supply than there is any actual demand for cotton at that time. Then somebody has got to buy that cotton from people who are unable to hold it themselves. That is where the legitimate speculator comes in. In other words, he does not necessarily have to be a spinner. He may be a banker; he may be a Member of Congress—if one could be found who had money enough to buy cotton. The speculator can buy all the cotton which is not at the time needed by the spinner, and hold it, selling it later, when there is a demand from the spinner, and making a profit. That man has been a benefit to the cotton trade, because he has kept off of the market the excess of the commodity at a time when there was no demand for all cotton offered. That is legitimate speculation; that is real speculation; that is speculation which may always result in a profit to all persons engaging in it, but, of course, may sometimes result in a loss. The other kind of speculation never can result in a profit to one without a corresponding loss to the other. Now, as 95 per cent of the dealings on the cotton exchange are of the kind I have just mentioned as gambling transactions, how can it possibly be of any benefit to actual business?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman explain the difference between what he classifies as bad speculation or reprehensible speculation and this speculation that he approves? For instance, these transactions that he has been detailing are not all cash transactions. They are time transactions. And may not the man who buys from the gentleman's friend, Mr. CLARK, on time, and who then attempts to sell at a later date, lose as well as gain, and may not the person who buys from him, some cash and some time, also gain or lose?

Mr. SIMS. Do you mean buying contracts on a margin or dealing in actual cotton?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am talking about the transactions which you regarded as proper. They are not all cash transactions?

Mr. SIMS. Not by any means.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are time transactions?

Mr. SIMS. Some of them are.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the difference whether I buy from the gentleman from Missouri on time or whether I buy it from a cotton broker on time?

Mr. SIMS. Cotton or cotton contracts, which do you mean?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is immaterial; I buy cotton to be delivered when I need it.

Mr. SIMS. You intend to take the cotton and not settle at the difference?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would depend upon whether I needed the cotton at the time of delivery.

Mr. SIMS. If you bought it in advance and you didn't need it and you settled on the changes of the fluctuations through the margin, what would you call that?

Mr. BURLESON. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman from New York that this bill applies only to contracts where there is no intention whatever on the part of the seller or buyer of delivering or receiving the cotton.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Texas think it will be possible to ascertain whether two men making a contract, the one to buy and the other to sell cotton, actually intended at the time not to take or deliver the cotton?

Mr. BURLESON. That is a question of fact upon which the jury should be permitted to pass; but if it was a transaction of that kind, where the cotton was to be delivered, the gentleman's clients would never suffer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My clients, unfortunately, are not in that class.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in order to understand this, I want to read what is said in favor of these operations. I read from page 58 of Cotton Movements and Fluctuations, by Latham, Alexander & Co., New York, bankers and commission merchants, being the last report of that kind they have published. It is thoroughly reliable, being by one of the best firms in New York in every respect, and here is what they say, giving their reasons for this character of dealing. I invite your attention to it:

> To merchants and operators cotton contracts for future delivery afford great advantages; this is evidenced not only by the large business in New York, but also by the extensive business done in them in Liverpool. They fluctuate more widely and frequently than cotton, though governed in general by the course of actual cotton on which they are based.
> Contracts can not only be purchased, but can also be sold short. By dealing in them loss in weight, interest, insurance, and various other charges can be avoided. No large sums of money, such as are necessary when dealing in actual cotton, are required. At light expense the holder of a contract can avail himself of the fluctuations of the market during many months.

There is the milk in the cocoanut. The money that is made or lost is made or lost on fluctuations, and that is the only possible way to make it. Now, is this good business; is it good legislation to permit dealings in simple fluctuations in a great commodity, one of the greatest the world produces?

Mr. LOVERING. The bucket-shop principle.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; the bucket-shop principle, as the gentleman from Massachusetts states.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman state to what extent the fluctuations obtain?

Mr. SIMS. I will come to that directly. If these fluctuations did not affect the actual price of cotton, did not have a deleterious effect on the price of spot cotton, we would not complain, we would not care. If the people who thus speculate would not do anything that affected the actual price of cotton and bring about a fluctuation, it would not hurt anybody but the gentlemen who put up the margins. But we have great operators who carry as much as 500,000 bales of futures, and who can make no money on them without favorable fluctuations. What do they do? They become immediately interested in creating a favorable fluctuation. They go to work at once to bring about fluctuations that will give them other men's money without any equivalent value for the same.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If I want to buy 100 bales of cotton, pay for them in cash, whether they are delivered or not, is that proper according to your proposition?

Mr. SIMS. For future delivery? Perfectly proper.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Suppose I buy it in the hope and confidence that that cotton will rise in value in a month, and believing I can sell it for more, I pay for it. I buy it in the hope of making money by fluctuation, do I not?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Is that a proper transaction according to the gentleman's notion?

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman mean that he buys cotton or buys a contract?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I buy the cotton, and I buy it in the hope that it will rise in the future in the market.

Mr. SIMS. That is a perfectly legitimate transaction as I view it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And in the hope that I will make money by the fluctuation.

Mr. SIMS. By the increase.

Mr. DRISCOLL. By the fluctuation, by its fluctuating up.

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. DRISCOLL. That is proper, is it not?

Mr. SIMS. That is perfectly legitimate—by buying 100 bales of cotton everybody who owns cotton will be benefited, because it takes that much off the market.

Mr. DRISCOLL. But by and by I put it on the market again.

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman does, then it has a depressing effect to the extent of the weight of 100 bales.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I depress it then as much as I elevate it now.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know. It is owing to how long the gentleman holds it and the condition of the market when he offers it for sale.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I am trying to get the gentleman's distinction between what is legitimate and proper and what is reprehensible according to his notion.

Mr. SIMS. That is what I am trying to make plain to the House. Mr. Chairman, these interruptions are all pleasant and desirable, yet they get me off the main thread of my argument, and I may not always get back to it.

Now, our friends who maintain that the cotton exchanges are a benefit to the cotton industry say that there is an intimate relationship between them, and that trading in the exchange promotes the cotton industry as a whole. In that connection, I want to ask what I think is a very pertinent question. If they are related, and are beneficial to cotton and an aid to the handling of the same, would not the exchanges in the United States naturally be located and operated where the greatest amount of actual cotton business is transacted? How are the facts? The largest crop of cotton this country has ever produced was thirteen and a half million bales. I have it from what I regard as reliable sources of information, that the number of bales of cotton represented by the contracts sold in one year on the New York exchange will amount to 90,000,000 bales, between eighty and one hundred millions, more or less. That is the greatest number of bales of cotton contracts sold anywhere on the face of the earth, and if it was related to actual business we would expect to find in New York what we find in Liverpool—a vast hord of merchantable, desirable cotton that the spinner wants, and the spinner would go to New York to buy it.

If I had bought a May contract and wanted to get rid of it, and a spinner knew of that fact, he would buy it, possibly at a profit to me, because he wants what he knows he is going to get—spot cotton of a merchantable, spinable variety. What are the facts? I will read again from the same source. The cotton year ends on the last day of August always and therefore begins on the 1st day of September. The receipts for the port of Galveston for the cotton year of 1906–7, which is the last of which we have reports, was 3,891,695 bales. In New Orleans, the next greatest port, it amounted to 2,296,971 bales; at Savannah, Ga., 1,668,633 bales. There is no cotton exchange at Galveston in which you can buy and sell futures, as I understand, and there is none at Savannah. There is one in New Orleans and one in New York, the only two in the United States that do this business, as they call it. Let us take the port of New York where ninety millions are handled in contracts, and what do you suppose their total receipts were for that year? Twenty-three thousand one hundred and eight bales! Is not that conclusive evidence to any clear-minded, unprejudiced man that futures do not follow actual cotton transactions and that actual cotton transactions do not seek the place of the greatest contract transactions? In other words, they are not associated, and while the effect on the price of spot cotton is very great by the dealings done in New York on the cotton exchange, the effect generally on the whole cotton industry is deleterious. At the end of the cotton year, Galveston, which had receipts of nearly 4,000,000 bales, had left over 30,820 bales; New Orleans had left over 31,964 bales; Savannah had left over 8,593 bales. New York, which only had 23,108 bales during the entire year of receipts, had at the end of the year 169,975 bales left over.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Where did that come from?

Mr. SIMS. I will tell you. That statement seems a mathematical absurdity and looks impossible without explanation. How could they have six or seven times as much cotton left over at the end of the year as the receipts amounted to during the whole year? The average layman does not know, and I am not far above the average layman, either. Under the rules of the cotton exchange, cotton is made deliverable on contracts that no spinner wants or will have.

The result is that what accumulates there is unmerchantable, undesirable, unspinnable stuff which is used only to liquidate these gambling debts called "futures." Where did that hundred and some odd thousand bales, where did that vast number of bales that were left in New York at the end of that year come from, when the receipts for the whole year were 23,000 bales in round numbers? They were carried over from the year before. This cotton had been on hand doing the same old business at the same old stand for five years, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] says, delivered upon contracts, or not so much delivered as offered to be delivered. Now let me explain——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Let me ask one question. What character of cotton can be delivered under the rules of the New York Exchange in liquidation?

Mr. SIMS. I am going to come to that in a moment if I can reach it in order. Now, if the grades of cotton deliverable upon the cotton exchange of New York were such as to make it more desirable to own them than not to own them, they would not affect the price of cotton adversely. If I had bought cotton in New York, or you had, wanting to keep it until wanted by a manufacturer, the spinner, knowing he would get cotton of the kind he could use, would take our contract off our hands and receive the cotton. How many grades do you suppose are deliverable on the cotton exchange of New York? About thirty in all.

I will put in the RECORD a certificate by George Brennecke, chairman warehouse and delivery committee of the cotton exchange of New York, of September 30, 1907. Of all the cotton inspected and certificated and subject to delivery there classes that can be and are delivered upon contracts. Now, what is merchantable or desirable cotton? Every man who has given the cotton business any study knows that "middling" cotton is the basis. In other words, middling cotton is the cotton for which there is the greatest average demand the year round, so when a man buys cotton he buys middling basis, and that middling-cotton contract may be executed by delivering another grade with a certain number of points on or off the price of middling. If the New York Cotton Exchange was promoting actual cotton business, there would be in the warehouses cotton of average or desirable grades, would there not? Now, let me astonish you. Of middling basis there was only 375 bales in the whole lot of 138,484; of good middling tinged, value of middling, 146 bales; of grades above middling and worth more than middling, strict middling, 116 bales; barely good middling, 23 bales; good middling, 20 bales; fully good middling, 1 bale; strict good middling, 15 bales; barely middling fair, 7 bales; middling fair, none; strict middling fair, none, and fair, none, making 718 bales of cotton in the cotton warehouses of New York on the 30th day of September, 1907, that graded middling or above out of 138,484 bales that are receivable upon contract. Now, what was the number of bales below middling? Strict low middling, 2,212 bales; fully low middling, 8,857 bales; low middling, 22,782 bales. No grade of cotton good for delivery upon any contract upon the New York Exchange of a lower grade than that is wanted by spinners. Now, see what follows: Barely low middling, 30,848 bales; strict good ordinary, 27,554 bales; fully good ordinary, 9,318 bales; good ordinary, 6,772 bales; strict good middling tinged, 45 bales; strict middling tinged, 386 bales; middling tinged, 2,026 bales; strict low middling tinged, 8,476 bales; low middling tinged, 8,967 bales; strict good ordinary tinged, 3,190 bales; fully middling stained, 2,261 bales; middling stained, 2,028 bales; barely middling stained, 477 bales; strict low middling stained, 1,012 bales; fully low middling stained, 26 bales; low middling stained, 544 bales. This whole lot is certified as being deliverable upon New York contracts. Suppose my friend Mr. LOVERING here, who is a manufacturer of cotton goods, wanted 5,000 bales of cotton of middling basis, or within the grades two above and two below. Could he buy it in New York? Would he buy on contract in New York and accept delivery? No. Suppose you wanted 1,000 bales of middling and better. Could you get it out of this large hoard of 138,000 bales? No. What is the result?

The only cotton certificated here as being on hand is 7 bales of barely middling fair, which is 100 points or 1 cent higher than middling basis. The next amount is 15 strict good middling which is 75 points higher. The next is 1 bale of fully good middling 62 points higher, and the next is 23 barely good middling. The next is 37 strict middling. That is better than middling, and 35 good middling tinged, valued as middling. There is no cotton kept there as certificated cotton that is more than 1 cent or 100 points higher than the basis middling. Now, let us read the cotton in that list below any desirable grade and see the difference. There is barely low middling which is 125 points below or a cent and a quarter less—30,848 bales; strict good ordinary, 150 points below basis, 27,554, and so it goes on down until a grade, deliverable on contract is reached, which is 300 points below basis.

Where is the exporter or manufacturer who is going to New York to buy cotton of the grades certificated in these warehouses? I will tell you who buys these contracts; they are the "lambs." Let me tell you where the "lambs" live. A large percent of them live south of the Mason and Dixon line. They are always booming cotton. They are always bullish, to use a market phrase. The people who grow cotton in the South, the merchant who buys it, the banker who advances upon it, are always interested in maintaining the stability of the prices of this product. Therefore they reason the way they hope and see evidence that convinces them that cotton is going up that would not convince people who are not thus interested.

So all of us down South are hoping and praying and working for maintaining and sustaining better cotton prices. What is the result?

Literature goes down there advising us to buy futures. You can buy it for $2 a bale margin, while the original margin is $5 a bale. We reason why not buy a hundred bales of futures, instead of going out and working yourself half to death and sweating your life out to make 10, 15, or 20 bales the way God told Adam to make it? What is the result? Literature floods the country advising us to buy fall contracts sent there by the professional operators. Our people, as a rule, do not know a thing about the operations of the New York or Liverpool cotton exchanges. They do not know that this stuff I have referred to above can be dumped on them. But they say, "Buy cotton." It is in the air; it is in the papers; it is everywhere, and the lambs march in and buy it. I knew a man once, whose hair was growing gray, in a little town in my district, that mortgaged his land to buy cotton contracts in New York City, about which he knew nothing under heaven, and was taking it on faith. That man's farm went, and he is left in poverty in his old age. The people of the South will not stand this any longer. There must be a change of contract grades upon the New York Cotton Exchange which will not ruin all those who are uninformed—in other words, the lambs who deal there. But where would they get their pickings if they did not have lambs? In order to popularize it and make it appear a legitimate business, they say the spinner who sells his goods far ahead buys a cotton future to protect him. He hedges, in other words. The hedging argument is used to make a fraudulent transaction respectable. I had it explained to me by a great exporter—but I will not call his name—last February. He said:

A man comes to me and he wants 1,000 bales of cotton for October delivery, or he writes me or wires me from Europe. He knows I am responsible. He knows if I sell to him he can hold me liable for the cotton or its value. I sell him 1,000 bales of cotton, to be delivered next fall when the cotton farmer is delivering his crop, when I know I can buy it. I have not got it now. I can not go out and buy 1,000 bales of cotton and put it in a warehouse and pay insurance and storage on it and lose the interest on the money. What do I do? I look at the price of October futures, and I sell him at the price enough above the October option in futures to enable me to make a profit on the transaction to cover interest, commission, etc., and at once buy 1,000 bales of October delivery as a hedge.

He would make a sale to the spinner of a thousand bales, to be delivered in October, and purchase 1,000 bales of October futures as a hedge, as a protection against the possible fluctuation of spot cotton. When the time comes I know that the farmers will have cotton to sell, far more than they can find a market for. Therefore I take no risk, and when I have bought my cotton in Texas, Mississippi, or Georgia and shipped to my foreign purchaser, I sell out my hedge.

Now, that is what he calls a hedge. I said to him—and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] and, I think, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. Bowie, were present—I said, "Mr. A, suppose that there were nobody but exporters doing that future business, who would buy your hedge when you offered it in October?" "Oh, why," he said, "of course, there is a broad market." I asked "Who makes it broad? You say you are in favor of legitimate business, pray tell me who will buy your October option when you have sold the October spot cotton." "Oh, well, there is always a broad market in New York at some price. I may lose some on it, but I calculated on that in the beginning." I said to him, "If it was not for the speculative element, pure and simple, and you had no other opportunity to sell, except to exporters or spinners, could you operate that hedge?" He said, "No." So that the gambling operations in cotton causes the necessity for the hedge and furnishes the means of the hedge. That is called legitimate business. The legitimate feature of it could not last twenty minutes if the gambling element were eliminated by this or any other bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my colleague tell the committee how many million more bales of cotton are sold than are actually raised?

Mr. SIMS. I stated that a very few minutes ago.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not hear it.

Mr. SIMS. But I will repeat it. In the New York exchange you can deal only in cotton grown in the United States. With a crop of 13½ million bales actually grown in the United States there were sold on the New York exchange over 90,000,000 bales for the same year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can not we shut them off from this gambling scheme by shutting them off from the use of the mails?

Mr. SIMS. That is the object of the Burleson bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to make one statement that will broaden your statement. Of course, I do not know much about cotton, but they work this precise trick on every commodity grown. Now, you say that southern fellows naturally "bull" cotton. All the people in our section of the country naturally "bull" the corn market and the wheat market and the oat market, and all the rest of them, and they do just as you do, because they always bet the way they want it to go.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know about the operations of the grain exchange or board of trade in Chicago. They may have grades requiring the delivery of a good product which might not depress the price, but I am saying what the New York cotton exchange is doing with their present methods, forcing upon people what can not decently be called cotton as a delivery upon contracts as a part of their gambling transactions.

Mr. LOVERING. I hope the gentleman will make perfectly clear where he classes a transaction like this: A cotton spinner having some goods to be delivered in October buys a thousand bales of October cotton. He buys them where he can. He buys them of a man either in the cotton exchange or the man who grows it, to deliver through the cotton exchange a thousand bales at the prices given for October, and they want to see about what makes the price of October. He is the spinner, as in this case. When I buy a thousand bales from the cotton exchange to be delivered in October I do not expect to pay for it until October. That saves to me the warehouse charges and insurance, carriage, etc. Is it not a perfectly legitimate transaction for me to buy that cotton in that way and then by the time that October comes around I will call upon this man to deliver the cotton? If he can not deliver it to me, I sell those futures and buy a thousand bales of real cotton in the South. Will any such transaction as that affect the cotton market adversely in the South?

Mr. SIMS. I am glad the gentleman asked the question. Now, with all the people in the South bullish, and with the hedging of the kind you have just mentioned, the exporters are buying cotton for future delivery, buying futures; the cotton raiser and the cotton dealer in the South are also buying futures for fall delivery, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] has just illustrated a case to us. In the fall of the year, when there are millions more bales of actual cotton being delivered than there is any money to pay for, or any demand for, and almost hundreds of millions of futures dumped at the same time upon the market, you see what effect hedging has. It weighs upon the market in addition to the weight of actual cotton offered by the growers.

I want to say something a little bit further in that line. It is true that ultimately supply and demand will regulate the price, but the farmer in the South, the tenant, the merchant, the small banker, can not wait until "ultimately" for their money. They must sell on the immediate market, which is influenced by the cotton futures in New York. Those futures are quoted in every paper in the United States. Futures are quoted in New York from 10 o'clock on until 3 by wire. In the afternoon at 2 o'clock, after the great bulk of the future business is done for the day, they quote the price of "spots." How do they make them? There may be sometimes an actual sale of cotton to a spinner like my friend, and it is put down as a sale of spots. But any time you deliver any of that stuff on contracts, that my friend says has lain for five years in the warehouses, it is marked as a spot sale.

Mr. LOVERING. The gentleman knows there is never a bale of that hardly delivered. It is what is termed unspinnable cotton. It remains on the market, as the gentleman says, as a drug on the market, but if ever it is delivered, it is delivered with the differential in the cost. But that is neither here nor there. The gentleman has not yet explained that the transaction which I have suggested can not be adverse to the price of cotton in New York. The transaction which I have referred to is a necessary one, or I could not make a delivery of my goods in China or elsewhere next October, unless I know what I am going to get my cotton for. The gamblers may be in the New York Cotton Exchange, but the gentleman himself has admitted that they are all bullish in the South, and they are all gamblers in one direction, and they are just as reprehensible as the spinner or anybody else in New York who may be depressing the market.

Mr. SIMS. That is all true. Every word the gentleman says is true, but I am showing you the benefits to the country to be derived from the legislation proposed.

Mr. BURLESON. I can answer that question, if the gentleman will permit me. He buys these thousand bales as a spinner, and has to hedge to protect himself against the fluctuation in the price of his raw material. This fluctuation we contend is caused by the gambling on the cotton exchanges, and if you remove the cause there will be no necessity for you to protect by hedging against this proposition.

Mr. LOVERING. I do not want the gentleman to understand that I am opposed to the features of this bill. Quite the contrary; only I do want it distinctly understood by the House that there is a transaction of that nature where a man legitimately hedges his sales and purchases.

Mr. BURLESON. Under existing conditions it is necessary; but if you remove the conditions it will not be necessary, and the condition now is that this fluctuation is caused by gambling in this great product.

Mr. LOVERING. It is no more in New York than it is in the South.

Mr. BURLESON. I confess that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. SIMS. I want to answer the other question now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In connection with that, I should like to ask the gentleman to state whether it is not a fact that before the organization of the New York Cotton Exchange the fluctuations in cotton were much more violent than they are to-day.

Mr. SIMS. I will answer that question in the course of my remarks, if I can get time to finish my speech. The gentleman from Massachusetts stated a perfectly legitimate transaction under existing conditions, and he asks how does it affect the price of cotton in the market. I will show him. You may say because you have a thousand bales of futures to sell and want to buy a thousand bales of spots that the buying and the selling offset and neutralize each other.

Not at all, because they are not done simultaneously. When you buy 100 bales of spot cotton and sell 100 bales of futures, they might tend to neutralize the effect of both, if done at the same moment. But my friend buys 1,000 bales of spots and ships it. Then he sells the 1,000 bales of futures. The futures do not affect the price of the spot cotton he has bought; but by putting them on the market as a liquidation, as they call it, after he has purchased his spots, it does affect the price of all unsold cotton to that extent.

Mr. LOVERING. But the gentleman must acknowledge that the time comes when I actually take the 1,000 bales from the market.

Mr. SIMS. You take it, but you do not sell the future until after you have done it, and the future becomes a weight on the market.

I do not object to hedging if it could be done without the gambler, but the gambler has to furnish the means of hedging. My friend is a spinner and he has bought his 5,000 bales, and other spinners have bought their 5,000 bales, and they all get the spots in the fall to the extent they want them; but they do not buy a whole year's supply, and then they all dump their futures at once and the market goes to pieces as a result of selling out these hedges.

I will show you how the exporter operates. The exporter buys futures to cover sales he makes for future delivery. In the fall of the year if there is a short crop and actual cotton is going to be high and the speculative fever has taken hold of the lambs of the South and they put futures up, he will buy his spot cotton first. Why? It will sustain the market and furnish the cause for a further advance of futures, and after he has bought 5,000 or 10,000 bales then he turns loose his futures to us lambs at a profit over and above, perhaps, what he gave for the spot, because the purchase of the spot helps to keep the price up and supports the market for futures.

On the other hand, by selling out his hedge before he buys the spot the spots are depressed. He always wants to operate on futures so as to benefit by the transaction. If futures are lower than spots, he sells his futures out, so as to give a further downward tendency to the market, and buys spot cotton afterwards in a market depressed by his sale of futures.

Let me read you from a high authority. A few years ago the Agricultural Committee, of which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] is now the distinguished chairman, but who was then a member of the committee, had a hearing on the question of Government reports on cotton crops and effects. In that hearing Mr. MacColl, chairman of the New England Cotton Manufacturers' Association, was one of the witnesses. While my question was not germane, I butted in through the kindness of the members of the committee. In asking questions I did it in a way that indicated that I was antagonistic to his position, in order that I might get a candid answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I would like fifteen minutes more.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman fifteen minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. I asked Mr. MacColl this question. You will remember that Mr. MacColl is president of the New England Cotton Manufacturers' Association. He is a high authority on the actual cotton business, as high as there is in the world:

Mr. SIMS. I would like to have you define what you mean by the term "speculator."

Mr. MACCOLL. I think it is very well understood that there is a large number of people connected with the speculation in cotton, raising or depressing the price.

That is the business of the kind of speculator that he referred to.

Then I asked him:

Professional operators?

Mr. MACCOLL. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask you if spinners do not buy and sell futures?

Mr. MACCOLL. Yes; they do to some extent.

Mr. SIMS. And to that extent are they not speculators to all intents and purposes?

Mr. MACCOLL. I think they are speculators in one sense of the word if they do that at all, but everybody is speculating in business to some extent.

Mr. SIMS. Then the spinner wants the future market all to himself, but he does not want the professional operator? He wants to exclude the professional operator?

Mr. MACCOLL. My opinion is that the spinners of this country have used the future market to a very small extent. Lately they have been forced to use it more, but they have not used it to any large extent in years gone by. There are thousands and thousands of manufacturers who have never bought a bale of futures.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is the highest New England authority upon whether or not this future business is necessary to cotton manufacturers. My questions were along the line of antagonism.

Mr. GARRETT. In that connection, one of the grounds assigned to support the future dealing is that it is a benefit to the planter. Does not the gentleman know that there is not 1 per cent of the planters who ever buy a future?

Mr. SIMS. Why, of course, that is true. I will read further:

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that the speculators are divided into bulls and bears, and that the effect of their operations is nil?

Mr. MACCOLL. If there is no evil about it, it is not worth while for us to waste time about it. We think it has been a tremendous evil in the last three or four years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, where is the man who is going to fly in the face of such authority and get up here and say that this business ought to be protected and that the mails should be made subservient to it? [Applause.] As far as the planter is concerned, to which my colleague refers, how many poor negro cotton raisers in the South can buy or sell a future or know anything about it? How many poor white cotton raisers in the South can buy or sell a future or know anything about it? How many cotton farmers make 100 bales of cotton? And you can not buy or sell less than that number of bales on any cotton exchange. The number of farmers or cotton producers who could avail themselves of the benefit, if there was any benefit in the cotton exchange, is very small, and on account of the number of bales necessary to be bought or sold in order to deal at all the number of farmers who could operate is rendered a negligible quantity, and need not be considered at all. But I said a while ago that many people in the South buy futures. First, in the bucket shops, because they sell less than 100 bales—down to 10, I believe. The bucket-shop keeper is the gambler at both ends of the line. He holds the stake of the man who operates with him and he does not put up anything against it. If you gamble in the cotton exchange, they make you put up your money with a responsible party, and the man with whom you gamble puts up his with a responsible party, and in this way you get the winnings if you win. Almost every legislature in the South has abolished the bucket shop and wire house. It can not in any way benefit the farmer.

But on the other hand, let us take the merchant, the lawyer, the banker, the man who has money enough to buy cotton on the cotton exchange, or to sell it. They go in without ever having studied these things and they buy their cotton contracts in New York, and the price may actually go up, and they think that it is going higher and that they will just buy a little more. They write to the broker in New York and ask how much money is needed to take this cotton, if tendered. The broker tells them, and when they are informed that they have potentially purchased a lot of stuff for which there is no demand and no practical use can be made of it, except to gamble with. What do they do? They sell out the cotton contract before the month of delivery arrives, take the brand of "lamb," and go home wiser and poorer men. The great operator on the cotton exchange who knows human nature knows our disposition, and so he floods the country with literature in the early part of the spring and summer to the effect that cotton is going to be high, and advises those who can to buy. What is the result? They buy October, December, and January cotton contracts, and when October, December, and January come around they are dumping on the market the contract cotton that these speculators sold them, and at the same time dumping their own labor-made field-grown cotton on the market. The weight of actual cotton depresses the price, and the weight of the futures bought by the lambs help to further depress it. Should we not protect these poor lambs, black and white, south and north, by denying the use of the mails, the telegraph, and the telephone for this kind of operation?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. We have the promise that will be done, and all who oppose it are going to get run over in this Congress.

Mr. SIMS. I hope so. It is said the law of supply and demand ultimately controls prices, but the trouble is that we get depressed before the ultimate period arrives, on account of intermediate manipulation. I knew a gentleman who was in New York one day in a broker's office in the month of August, when there was a large decline of futures—a heavy decline—75 or 80 points. Everybody was frightened and running to sell out, and before 2 o'clock came, the time when they report the price of spots, some man present said that spots would be marked down to-day. "What! Marked down?" The reply was, "Yes. Just look how futures have gone." When the time came to report the price of spot cotton what do you suppose it was? Spots were marked 60 points down by reason of decline in the future market. What else? At the same time in big letters was written on the board, "Sales, none." That has got to be almost the rule in the New York Cotton Exchange, "Spots, such and such a price; sales, none." Pray tell me how you can quote the spot price of a thing that was not sold. Go where you please, wherever men are dealing in actual cotton or futures the first thing they do in the morning is to call for and look at the newspapers. They read the market gossip. The next thing they put a telephone receiver to their ears and call up a broker and ask, "How did Liverpool open this morning?"

If Liverpool opens down, he hastens to his broker and gives an order to sell his contract at the market, and away goes his margin. If it opens up, he goes down and gives him an order to buy more. Futures control the price of that man's actual cotton and contracts, and that man's action based on same controls money and conditions. You will find the price of spot cotton thus arbitrarily made is telegraphed all over the United States, and the next day men buy spot cotton much lower on account of this arbitrarily fixed price. Suppose you are a spot buyer. You say that you will give ten and a half for a hundred bales of cotton to-morrow. You get a wire from your broker saying that futures went off forty points to-day. Do you buy that cotton to-morrow? No. Why? Because you do not know but that it will decline further; you know if futures decline further spots will follow, so you wait and wait and wait for no other reason under heaven than that the future markets are declining in New York. Now, I want to say this, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this House, that if there is any good growing out of the existence of the New York and New Orleans cotton exchanges, the evil caused by possible and actual operations on them is so much greater that it vastly overbalances the good, and the country can do without the little good in order to get rid of the great evil. I want to read you something; I want to show——

Mr. BURLESON. Before the gentleman reads that I would like him to show the fluctuations during a given period.

Mr. SIMS. I have it right here, and I want to say that no man engaged in the actual cotton manufacturing business can contend with such things as I have here to show you and prosper. In the year 1903–4 there was a great speculation started by Mr. Sully, of New York. He was the bull leader, and at one time in the world's history the farmer got a part of the benefit of it. A very distinguished citizen of Texas, Governor Hogg, who has since died, made a speech and said he wanted the people of the South to support Brown, Hayne, and Sully, the redeemers of the cotton industry in the South. In the month of February the July option—that is, cotton for July delivery—in New York sold the first week as high as 17.55 cents per pound. In the same month, the week ending the 19th, the July option sold as low as 13.02 cents per pound, over twenty and a half dollars a bale fluctuation in that far-off month, in the same month of February of that year.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What became of the legitimate hedger then?

Mr. SIMS. The hedger? Why he was up a tree.

Mr. BURLESON. He went to the wall.

Mr. SIMS. Now, let us see what July future sold for in July of the same year. In July, the July future—the very first, or opening sales in July—sold as low as 10.18. From 17.55 in February there was a decline in the July option to 10.18 when sold in the first week in July. Show me where the purchaser or spinner can be benefited by that.

Mr. SCOTT. What was the spot price for July?

Mr. SIMS. I have not it here, but it is worth about forty points more than the future. Shortly after July sold for 17.55 in February Mr. Sully failed in New York, and cotton went to the dogs, as we call it. Futures tumbled down and spots went with them, though the supply was actually decreasing all the time. But what else? On account of that speculation spot cotton was put up so high that many of the New England spinners closed their mills and stopped business.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What was the difference per bale?

Mr. SIMS. Over $37.50 per bale. The year before, called the "Brown and Hayne year," some of the bears who sold thought they could break the corner with the weight of actual cotton, and paid so high a price in New York that cotton was shipped back by the spinners to New York from Europe to deliver upon these contracts. Freight had been paid on these bales of cotton to the spinner in Europe and then repaid back because it was worth more to gamble with than to spin and manufacture.

The president of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange was talking to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] and myself this winter about the Burleson bill. I was complaining of the method of grading in New York. He, in a manner, by not denying what I said, acquiesced in it. I told him that I thought the gradings for delivery in New Orleans were better than in New York. He agreed with me. In the course of the conversation he spoke of a clique who, during a summer vacation in Colorado at some time in some former season, determined to go to New York and sell the market down regardless of supply and demand, and did so.

Let me read what this gentleman, Mr. Thompson, president of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, says about operations upon the New York Cotton Exchange. He ought to be an authority, ought he not? It is from the Shreveport Journal, a newspaper published in Shreveport, La. He sent out a circular or letter to the cotton growers and farmers of Louisiana, Texas, and other places, and here is so much of it as appears in the newspaper I have mentioned:

A decline of $6 per bale within less than a week represents a serious loss. The fact that values could be thus annihilated without any just or reasonable cause is a consideration of grave importance. A man may waste his property or lose it through ignorance or mistaken judgment; another pecuniary loss covers the injury. When one's property is taken from him by unexpected assault, he loses not only his property but his rights. It is therefore of the first importance that the agency inflicting such a loss be discovered and the remedy for the wrong be found and applied.

In order to break the market 113 points within less than a week, in spite of the fact that every legitimate influence was against such a decline, it has been necessary to sell a tremendous lot of cotton that is not in possession nor yet bought. These short contracts are still open and the market is largely oversold. Great profits on the contracts may be figured on paper, but these profits are unrealized as yet. In order that the profits may be realized the contracts must be liquidated—that is, the seller must either buy back his contracts or be able to buy the equivalent in spot cotton on the basis of the contract prices. * * * The holder of spot cotton has the key to the situation. * * * If the spot holder refuses to sell his cotton at 11⅞ cents in the interior, then the seller of a contract at 12 cents will be in trouble, and so on up the line. Without the aid of speculation the producer has only himself to depend upon. It is a big contract, but he has in his hands the means wherewith he can defend his rights and right his wrongs. He can snatch victory from defeat.

He has but to refuse to accept the price, by manipulation fixed for him, and the triumph of the bear will be brief and the "fruits thereof will turn to ashes in his mouth." * * * But we do not believe the present prices are natural or legitimate. The brief experience we have had with the market this season, before speculation interfered, showed that consumers were willing to pay the prevailing prices and producers were willing to accept them. If business had been permitted to run in its natural course, probably the increased volume of receipts would have gradually lowered prices. This would have been a natural and acceptable result. But when an outside element that knows nothing about cotton and has no interest therein, except as a medium of gambling profits, arbitrarily interferes between producer and consumer and undertakes to fix prices by sheer force of money and manipulation, we believe in suspending the rules and striking with the weapon in hand. The producer has the weapon.

Mr. Chairman, will gentlemen who oppose the Burleson bill, tell us what stronger proof can be demanded of the possibilities for evil afforded by the operations of persons in no way connected with actual cotton business upon the cotton exchanges of this country than is given by Mr. Thompson in the above article? Is it not conclusively shown by his statement just read that these exchanges are so conducted as to afford facilities for gambling and manipulation tenfold more ruinous than beneficial to the legitimate cotton industry of this country?

In the light of these disclosures, if we continue to permit the use of the mails in such a nefarious and ruinous business, do we not become parties to, if not participators in, these blighting and unholy transactions, and will we not be held responsible, and justly so, by our confiding constituents for the further continuance of such damnable operations when we have the power to end them?

Do you want to continue the use of the mails of the United States for men to do what Mr. Thompson says they were doing by the mere force of money? [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHANEY].

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Chairman, like a great many others, I believed that when the destruction of the American industrial system was accomplished in 1894, and its consequent train of disasters came upon us, if we should again establish the opportunities for endeavor through an equitable protective tariff, and, by appropriate legislation, insure the soundness of our circulating medium, panics would be impossible. Up to that time the financial integrity of our banking institutions was never questioned, and our great financiers were regarded as safe counselors and advisers. It was not supposed that the very fountains of credit would be poisoned by the reckless speculator, and that he would be permitted to crowd out the honest banker and convert the financial temple into a house of financial prostitution. Up to that time trust companies were regarded as the very essence of financial integrity and solid financial faith. No one then supposed that there could possibly be such faithless officers of a trust company as to gamble in trust funds. No one dreamed of an unholy combination of men to buy up the controlling stock in a chain of banks or to jeopardize in speculation a hundred millions of the money of their depositors. We had no idea that "green goods" bank directors would sit in the seats of the mighty men whose genius had made the United States the business wonder of the century.

Up to that time we had supposed the proper function of a bank in accepting deposits was to loan them out on satisfactory security, to be eventually returned to the depositors on demand. It was a thing beyond our comprehension that a national bank, with $94,000,000 of deposits, should invest $55,000,000 of those deposits in miscellaneous stocks and bonds. We made no calculation that safety deposit vaults were to be raided by speculative adventurers and that the officers of these institutions should engage in trading the deposits of their customers among themselves. Up to that time we supposed it to be the duty of the bank to keep the money for its depositors instead of keeping it from its depositors.

We were not acquainted with high finance when we concluded that, with an industrial system to prosper us and a sound dollar to assure us, we should go on everlastingly from one success to another.

Gamblers and speculators we have ever had, but we have, fortunately, heretofore kept them out of the seats of the mighty.

The foundation for this situation of the circulating medium of the country was laid at the time that the banks began to pay interest on their deposits. It would be well to go back to first principles in banking and see if it is in accordance with true banking principles to pay interest on deposits in any bank anywhere. There are many propositions before this House as to what rate of interest a bank should be permitted to pay. In my humble judgment, it is not proper to pay any interest at all; for it follows, as a matter of course, that the bank must place the money of its depositors where it may be able to get more interest than it pays its depositors and at the same time have a reserve on hand equal to the demands on the bank. It is therefore contrary to the ethics of banking to pay any interest at all. It was through this error in banking that the money of the western banks got into the Wall street banks ,which caused the famine in money with which to move the crops in harvest time. Western banks paid interest to their depositors and, in order to make the interest they were bound for, sent their deposit money to the banks in New York, where speculation is the chief financial ambition and where high rates of interest may be obtained. To usury the western banks sacrificed their financial ability and business integrity. But for the obligation to pay interest to local depositors the money would not have gone East at all, except for purposes of exchange, and the money gamblers in New York would have had the panic all to themselves.

By draining the country of its cash by a higher rate of interest in Wall street than could be afforded elsewhere, and then refusing to pay it back on demand; by sacrificing bank securities to speculative ventures, thereby frightening every bank depositor and creditor, and by robbing the financial centers of all conservatism and business philosophy the financial speculators who gambled on other people's money produced the panic. Of money there was a plenty; of business there was an abundance; of work there was no limit.

We did not have to borrow money to pay the expenses of the Government or to maintain the gold reserve. The Government was not in financial distress. In its vaults were $1,688,027,086.83. (See p. 3, Secretary's report, 1907.)

On the basis of existing laws, the estimate of total revenues for the fiscal year 1909, the money in sight is $878,123,011.30. (See p. 8, same report.)

At the close of the fiscal year 1907 the money in circulation in the United States amounted to $2,772,956,455, or a per capita of $32.22 (p. 11, same report).

At the time of the panic, and since, the circulation is $35 per capita,

At the close of the fiscal year 1907 the Treasury held in gold the sum of $904,691,730.14 (same page). At the same time the Treasury held in silver $77,001,368.

The available cash balance in the general fund at the close of the fiscal year 1907 was greater by $91,372,090.65 than that of 1906 (p. 12, same report).

It was not a question, therefore, of a lack of money upon which to transact the necessary business of the country. It was simply our inability to get hold of that money on account of the manipulations of the circulating medium in the great financial center of New York. It therefore seems to me that the question raised by the panic is not a currency question at all, and the remedy for the question raised by the panic was that of devising some means by which we should stop the hoarding of money, take the scare out of the depositors in future, and enable them to bank their money with assurance that it would be forthcoming on demand.

Accordingly, on the 19th of December I introduced House bill H. R. 10526, looking to the security of depositors and creditors of national banks, and I believe that, so far as we can see the causes of this panic and the prospects of its recurrence, some such bill as mine would prevent any such panic in the future. I know there are some, and those among very worthy councilors of the nation, look upon such a scheme as that embraced in this bill as boyish and unworthy the serious consideration of the Congress. But let me tell you, there are a great many people in this country who will not be satisfied with financial legislation unless the plan adopted shall embrace some measure calculated to secure depositors in their money.

This plan of mine taxes the average deposits of national banks one-tenth of 1 per cent per annum, to be paid into the United States Treasury, to constitute a fund to secure individual depositors against loss by liquidation or failure of national banks, or from theft or peculation of officers or directors of the bank. It does not involve the Government in anything more than the collection of the money and as a trustee of the fund thus created.

By calculation it is found that such a tax would equal the amount of losses to depositors in the most disastrous year of our history, and would therefore meet the demands of the situation. Objection is urged to such a proposition, because the sound and substantial banks would thereby be made to stand good for the irresponsible banks. But when such a scheme should go into operation there would be no irresponsible banks, and there would be no more bank failures, for the plan would have the effect to secure honest men in all of the banks who would shun wild-catting and therefore bring about an honest and correct administration of all of the banks. Objection is urged against such a proposition by State banks and private banks and other financial institutions not authorized by this proposed law, but that could be readily obviated by postponing the operation and effect of the proposed law until the legislatures of the States have had opportunity to meet and provide for some security to depositors in these other financial institutions. This would therefore not give United States banks any advantage over State institutions. Moreover, it would not be an undesirable thing, if the currency legislation embraced in the so-called "Aldrich and Fowler bills" should be enacted into law, to convert all financial institutions into one harmonious plan under Government authority. The money of the country is national, and a national control of the circulating medium of the land would seem to harmonize with the business necessities of the country.

A good deal of sport has been made of this panic by our Democratic friends, who affect to believe that the tariff law is responsible for the same, or, if not responsible therefor, is at least impotent to prevent panic. Neither is the decalogue, and adherence thereto, a prevention of panic.

If I am right in what I have above expressed as to the real causes of the panic, the Dingley tariff law has no relation whatever to the panic, and that therefore this panic means no disparagement of Republican policies. Our Democratic friends have always chafed under the fact that with Grover Cleveland the second came a change in the industrial system of the country and the panic that lasted four years. As was well said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] the other day:

> The panic of 1893 came in with that Democratic Administration, stayed with that Administration, and went out with that Administration.

The issue of bonds of that Administration in a time of peace, to pay the actual running expenses of the Government, has always been a tender spot with our Democratic friends. They, therefore, naturally gloated over the fact that bonds were actually issued by the present Administration in a time of peace, with no disturbance on the horizon anywhere, except Robley D. Evans's battle fleet encircling the Horn for San Francisco.

Now, let us look into the facts embraced in the issue of bonds in these two Administrations, and let us ask why money was borrowed by the present Administration through the issue of bonds? Mr. Roosevelt borrowed the money to supply the void created by the rape of the money of the depositors in New York banks and trust companies, and the consequent accidental and incidental contraction of the circulating medium in that great financial center. The Treasury was all right; the Dingley tariff was doing its duty all right; and the prosperity of the country was all right.

The Administration of Mr. Cleveland sold in bonds $262,315,400—the first, $134,000,000 at 5 per cent interest per annum, designated as the loan of 1894; and the residue at 4 per cent per annum, redeemable in 1925, which yet remains a debt against the country.

Mr. Roosevelt's Administration sold Panama Canal bonds at 2 per cent per annum, in the sum of $54,631,980—$30,000,000 in 1906, and $24,000,000 last November, the money from which will be used in constructing the Panama Canal. And this Administration also issued certificates of indebtedness at 3 per cent per annum, payable in one year from November, 1907, in the sum of $15,436,500, every dollar of which will be paid off before we get the election returns next November. These certificates of indebtedness were for the purpose of relieving the money stringency in the business affairs of the great financial center of New York. Not a dollar of it was needed to relieve the Treasury or to supply the necessities of the Government.

The Treasury was never before so plethoric and so sound. On the 26th day of this February the gold coin and bullion in the Treasury reached the sum of $1,000,473,031.45—$150,000,000 reserve fund, $829,651,869 in the trust fund, and $20,821,162.45 in the general fund.

The present Administration has something to show for the money borrowed, and will be able to account for every dollar of it in the financial management of the country, and will be able to hand over to the succeeding Administration a pocketbook bulging with money and securities equal to, if not in excess of, any other Government in the world.

Even after Mr. Cleveland had borrowed his $262,000,000 he did not have on hand, to turn over to Mr. McKinley, March 4, 1897, but $131,000,000; and instead of 5 per cents and 4 per cents, our bonds are threes and twos.

It was never claimed for the Dingley tariff that it would save everyone's door against the thief, a bit more than that the Church of Christ will keep all men out of hades.

There is therefore a vast difference in the issue of bonds under the present Administration from the issue of bonds under Mr. Cleveland's Administration.

Moreover, $15,000,000 is less than 6 per cent of $262,000,000, and therefore the Democratic panic on the basis of mathematical comparison is fifteen times as great as the Republican panic.

This Republican panic lasted three months, the Democratic panic lasted forty-eight months, just sixteen times longer than the Republican panic. The panic is over now, and the country will soon be over the panic.

Already the wheels which hesitated a few days have begun to turn. Business has discovered the culprit, branded him as a gambler who invaded the sacred precincts where he does not belong, driven him from the temple with lashes of public indignation, and prosperity has come back into its own with a more vigilant eye to educate and bless the country made great and strong by those eminent Republicans—Lincoln, Seward, Stanton, Grant, John Sherman, James A. Garfield, James G. Blaine, Benjamin Harrison, John Hay, William McKinley, and Theodore Roosevelt.

When the panic came business men stopped to take a long breath, investors hesitated to make sure, shippers waited a day longer to study the situation, and there was curtailment of orders here and there which, for the time, threw many out of employment. Railroads, having been cursed out of their senses, stopped many improvements and extensions until their wits returned. Now that we are sure that Rockefeller will never get to heaven and that everybody who damns him will, we are settling down to business, have oiled up the spindles of the prosperity wagon, and we are on our way.

LINTON PRIDES ITSELF ON INDUSTRIAL ACTIVITY—MINERS BUSY AND NEXT PAY DAY WILL SEE $100,000 DISBURSED BY THE OPERATORS.

LINTON, IND., February 24, 1908.

It begins to look as if the city were shaping itself for a substantial boom, promising to exceed the one of 1903 in lasting benefits. During the recent financial stringency many miners left the city in search of work, but they returned a few weeks later, satisfied that conditions were better here than elsewhere. During their absence work improved, and this has continued until now the miners are enjoying better times for this season of the year than they have for several years. Last pay day saw $75,000 distributed, and next Tuesday it is expected that $100,000 will be distributed. This represents but two weeks' work, while several thousand dollars are paid out monthly for other work.

The rolling mill, which recently resumed operations, is employing 150 men. The mill has worked both a day and a night force, and the management expects similar conditions to prevail all summer. Within the next ten days work on a sanitary sewer system, to cost $100,000, will begin, which will employ 150 men for three months, indicating that laborers will soon be in demand here.

A recent test of the Linton coal shows that it makes splendid foundry and domestic coke. The large ovens are nearly completed at the Black Creek mine, which will consume the entire output of the mine. About the 1st of May work will begin on the Carnegie library building, to cost $15,000.

Three years ago owners of rental property had many vacant homes at this time of the year, but now there is not a vacant house in the city, and there will be none during the year. Real estate men report a good demand for investment purposes. This city enjoys the reputation of more miners owning their homes than in any other mining town in the country. Within a short time it is believed that it will be as difficult to find a miner not owning his home as it was a few years ago to find one who did.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CHANEY. Surely.

Mr. PADGETT. I understood the gentleman a while ago to say that the recent panic had lasted three months.

Mr. CHANEY. Yes; I did.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, I rise simply to ask him to please give us the exact date at which it terminated, as a great many people in my country labor under the delusion that it is still on.

Mr. CHANEY. They are mistaken.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman tell us on what day the panic terminated?

Mr. CHANEY. It ended in three months from the time it started in.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman a further question. How does he account for the fact that there are so many people throughout the country that are still out of employment?

Mr. CHANEY. I account for that fact because of the necessity of people making their arrangements, now that they have satisfied the money center of New York, in getting the money with which to continue business.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman now why it was that the banks closed down, and if the banks that closed down have opened up?

Mr. CHANEY. I did not quite catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I asked the gentleman why the national banks, and the State banks as well, shut down and quit paying the people their money and, if they have stopped doing that, when did they do it?

Mr. CHANEY. In the first place the gentleman's question assumes a thing which is wide of the facts.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did the banks shut down in Indiana?

Mr. CHANEY. The State banks did not break down.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I did not say break down; I said shut off the payments.

Mr. CHANEY. The State banks limited checks in some instances, so far as they were limited by the banks of New York that operated in that kind of speculation which had their money.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, now, the national banks shut down, too.

Mr. CHANEY. The national banks so far as they were interfered with by that crowd, of which there are fifty-seven varieties in New York.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to say that every national bank that shut down was gambling in Wall street?

Mr. CHANEY. Every one that was affected by the gambling in Wall street limited payments on checks.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many were affected?

Mr. CHANEY. Not many of them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Were not the banks all over the United States affected?

Mr. CHANEY. Well, not all over the United States; here and there, however. It did not affect a single bank in my town.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did they continue to pay out the depositors' money to them?

Mr. CHANEY. They paid out the money to depositors when they called for it without limit or question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Without limiting the amount?

Mr. CHANEY. They did not limit the amount in any instance.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that they did that in Richmond and in Chattanooga; but they did not do that in Nashville, and they did not do it in Memphis, or in Louisville, or in Cincinnati, or Baltimore, or St. Louis, and they did not do it in New York; and these banks—that is, the New York banks, at least—affected the banks all over the United States, as a rule. Now, does the gentleman admit, or does he mean to state, that those banks that shut down were gambling in Wall street?

Mr. CHANEY. I do not mean to say that, and did not say it; but I do say that every bank that limited the amount of its payments limited them because of the interference with the ordinary business caused by the men who gambled in New York; not from any fault of their own.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman know who those men were?

Mr. CHANEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell me, then, who they are?

Mr. CHANEY. No, sir; I will not tell who they are. This is no place to do that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I introduced a resolution pretty early in the session to find out who they were or the cause of the panic and the shutting down of the banks and never have been able to get a report. If we had that we would all of us know. I am very glad that one Member has that knowledge.

Mr. WEISSE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CHANEY. Certainly.

Mr. WEISSE. A minute ago the gentleman stated that the panic lasted about six weeks and the panic of 1893 lasted at least a year?

Mr. CHANEY. You are mistaken about the time that I said. I said it lasted about three months.

Mr. WEISSE. I would like the gentleman to explain to this House why the total failures in the United States have been greater in 1908 than in any other year in the history of the country. Bradstreet reports the failures in the United States in 1908 are greater than they have ever been before in the history of the country.

Mr. CHANEY. I have not seen the report of Bradstreet, but I take it that Bradstreet's is too correct an agency to make any such report.

Mr. WEISSE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will get him the report if he will insert it in his remarks.

Mr. CHANEY. I will allow the gentleman to make his speech in his own way and in his own time. [Laughter.] I think I can make mine, and he can make his own when he comes to it.

Mr. WILLETT. I will ask the gentleman if he does not consider that the large numbers of men now unemployed is one of the elements of the panic?

Mr. CHANEY. It is not one of the elements of the panic, but simply one of the results of the panic.

Mr. WILLETT. So, then, the gentleman will have us to understand when he says that the panic ceased in three months after its inception or beginning—he would have us to believe that the panic itself is separate and apart from the results, and that we are now experiencing the results?

Mr. CHANEY. I do not know what you are doing in New York, but it is very largely over even there.

Mr. WILLETT. If you mean to deceive us——

Mr. CHANEY. I mean you to understand that I said that the panic is over and we will soon be over the panic.

Mr. WILLETT. That does not mean anything to me unless you connect the panic with results. A panic means nothing except we have that. We could go on having panics and have no results, but it is the panic and the results of the panic that are affecting the people of this country, and that is what we are talking about.

Now, if you do not mean the effect of the panic upon the people, why do you not say so, and say that the results are still upon us and we are still suffering from them, but that the cause has ceased?

Mr. CHANEY. I thought I had said something like that for the benefit of the gentleman. I simply said that the panic is over. There are a few places here and there where the effects of that panic will be felt until people can adjust themselves to the conditions and get business going again.

Mr. WILLETT. And you as a Member of this House would stand up in front of the bread line in New York City, where thousands of men every night are trying to get stale bread, and tell them, "Gentlemen, the panic is over." Is that what you mean?

Mr. CHANEY. No; I would not go to New York at all, because we are very much afraid of that place. [Laughter.] New York has been too much of the universe already for the good of the country.

Mr. WILLETT. You do not have to go to New York. You can go to any large city.

Mr. CHANEY. New York is a law unto itself. It creates panics and it must take the results of those panics.

I want to say to you now that we have always the poor with us, and New York always furnishes a good share of them.

Mr. WILLETT. But the condition in New York to-day is such as has never been seen in its history before.

Mr. CHANEY. I do not know about that. It has often complained.

Mr. WILLETT. That is what I want to find out, whether you know about it.

Mr. CHANEY. Anybody has but to go there and look and he can see it any year. It is no new thing for New York.

Mr. WILLETT. I simply wanted to ascertain if you knew something about the results of the panic when you said the panic was over three months after it began.

Mr. CHANEY. I am thoroughly acquainted with it.

Mr. WEISSE. The gentleman made one statement, or he tried to insinuate, that I rejoiced in this panic.

Mr. CHANEY. I did not mean the gentleman individually at all.

Mr. WEISSE. I wish to state to the gentleman that I am in the manufacturing business, and I am not rejoicing at the great losses that we have had from this panic. My interest in politics is not as great as my interest in the business of this country.

Mr. CHANEY. I did not mean the gentleman at all, unless he is responsible for the Democratic party.

Mr. WEISSE. But I want to tell you that the failures were greater than they ever were before in the history of this country.

Mr. CHANEY. That is a remarkable statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CHANEY. Now, in view of what has occurred on the other side, I want to tell Republicans over here that it is time for them to take heart. You know we have had a great deal of talk about panics and strikes, and the like, and I want to tell you the difference there is between a Republican strike and a Democratic strike. A Republican strike is where a man strikes for a larger loaf. A Democratic strike is where a man strikes because he gets no loaf at all. There is a vast difference between a Republican panic and a Democratic panic. A Republican panic is where you get the worst of it by letting a highwayman get hold of your pocketbook, on the theory that he will return it to you. A Democratic panic is where you have no use for a pocketbook at all, because you are strapped all the time. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WEISSE. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. CHANEY. I have only ten minutes, my friend.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CHANEY. Now, I say we ought to be ashamed of ourselves that this panic occurred at all, and I want our financial men west of the Alleghany Mountains hereafter to keep their money at home and not let it go East where these speculators and gamblers may get hold of it. But if this panic, which is as sweet a Democratic morsel as possible, is the only thunder that can be turned against us in the coming campaign, it will be hardly enough to substitute the crown of thorns and the cross of gold just yet.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. CHANEY. Excuse me, I would be delighted to do it, but I have only ten minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am listening to the gentleman's speech.

Mr. CHANEY. My Democratic friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], with nothing but this Republican panic to battle with, puts on his knightly shield and hurls his lance at such a distance from the election as to fall short of the Republican battle line, where it loses itself in the foxtail grass in which the Democratic party has been browsing for the last decade.

He says that every son of us who is here by less than 2,000 majority is his "meat"—and this is the meat on which this Cæsar feeds. Now, I never got but 1,500 majority in my most abundant victory, and he has thus singled me out for defeat. And it may be, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Missouri is the son of a prophet. It may be that defeat will become the unwelcome truth; but I want to say that when my opponent has won his fight next November he will also be fighting mighty hard for breath.

Sooner or later it will be necessary for a more comprehensive scheme of money circulation than we now have. Indeed, it is possible that had there been opportunity for the issue of some sort of emergency currency at the incipiency of the late panic, however doubtful it may have been in bridging over the mistakes made in the field of finance in New York City, it would have tided us over the difficulty. Our present financial scheme is based upon the United States debt, and this plan, so far as the Government is concerned, is such that it can not provide for a circulation based upon this debt in an amount in excess of this debt. Some other basis, therefore, for the currency than that of the Government debt must sooner or later be adopted.

In the consideration of a financial scheme it is necessary that we should take into account certain fundamental principles in whatever plan shall be adopted. Whatever is done should be done with a view to a practical and enduring currency scheme. If anything more is to be done than to provide for the assurance of depositors that their money is henceforth to be safe and secure when deposited in the banks, we should strive for something more than a temporary expedient. As hereinbefore said, the panic embraced at no time of its continuance a currency question. There was no need of any legislation or Treasury action, and there is none now because of any lack of money in the country. There is, and has all the time been, plenty of money—the money hid away because the owners of it were afraid of the banks.

The emergency currency, so called, is somewhat vague. A small sum of real money will do a vast amount of business. Business nowadays is usually done through check, and a rapid interchange of checks and bank balances through clearing-house provisions renders very small the actual amount of money, indeed, compared with the number and amount of the transactions involved.

I know a man who in one hay season transacted $95,000 worth of business on a capital of $5,000. He bought his hay and sold his hay generally by check, and in the activity of his purchases and sales he needed and used but $5,000.

In places, however, more money is needed at one time than at other times, and throughout the country there are times when more money is demanded than at other times. But I submit that there is no time when money needs be or should be authorized beyond the security of gold reserves. There must be a community of interest among the banks. They must act together to sustain their own credit and the credit of their depositors. They must protect themselves, and they must protect their depositors. Sound commercial paper is always backed by gold, and gold is the fundamental thing in the banking business.

As the issue of paper money increases so the gold reserves must increase, or you are on the way to inflation. The Government fiat is not money and never can be. It matters not by what cloak it may be covered, money is not made by law and can not be; money is made by labor. The Government is a power, but it is not the divinity which makes something out of nothing.

As before stated, our present system of currency rests upon Government bonds. It is illogical, for sooner or later the debt will be paid, and then the currency must fail. The Government debt is already too small to provide for the necessary currency of the country, according to all financiers. The business developments of the future are sure to become so great that the national banks will be deprived of the opportunity to obtain adequate circulating medium because of the lack of bonds upon which to base the same. As one writer has it, the business of the country has grown and the demands for more money has increased, but the power of the banks to meet these requirements is curtailed by the vanishing debt.

From statistics at the Treasury Department the outstanding Government bonds at the end of the last fiscal year equaled $925,159,200, of which the national banks held $524,036,980 to secure circulation, $97,171,580 to secure United States deposits, and $12,678,858 to secure other deposits; and there were $7,588,150 in bonds then on hand, making a total of $641,475,568 altogether. This would leave of the bonds outstanding but $283,683,631 in other hands than the national banks.

The capital of national banks August 22, 1907, amounted to $896,451,314, and therefore within a little over $28,000,000 of the entire bond issue of the United States. It is therefore plain that there must sooner or later be some other basis for circulation than Government bonds, or the circulating medium must cease to equal the demands of business, supposing that business will continue to grow.

There are various opinions as to what plan shall be adopted in the future. There are those who believe that there ought to be one great central bank, from which all the paper money of the country shall issue. There are others who believe that the Government itself, from the Treasury Department, should issue, on one basis or another, all the paper money of the Government and wipe out the national banks altogether. There are still others who believe that individual banks should be authorized to issue paper money upon such securities as might be accepted by conservative business men.

I was somewhat interested in the speech of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] the other day, wherein he argued that authority to issue credit currency be given to individual banks, and he gave us a striking instance of confidence in the banking system of Canada. In the instance he cited there was a liquidation by a certain bank, and there were no excited depositors standing in a long line to get their money because they had all confidence in the banking system of Canada. He must not forget, however, that sauce for the goose is not always sauce for the gander. There are different conditions in different places. A system of currency for Canada would hardly meet the necessities of a system of currency for the United States. The gentleman must not forget that there are but thirty-five banks in Canada, with aggregate note issues of never more than $75,000,000, whereas in the United States there are 6,500 issuing banks with outstanding notes aggregating $600,000,000.

The business territory of Canada does not stretch from the center of the Atlantic Ocean on the east to the farther side of the Pacific Ocean on the west. The business geography of Canada does not extend through 49 degrees of latitude.

Scotland has also been cited as an example for the United States currency, with its eleven banks whose aggregate note issues rarely equal $50,000,000. The speculative activity and business demands of the United States, with its great expanse of territory, could not be satisfied with what might fit Canada or Scotland.

Another thing we must never forget, namely, that bank notes must be convertible into money on demand, and that holders of such notes must count on their redemption in gold on demand. Any scheme of finance which loses sight of these principles can never be adopted with safety in the United States. Any scheme which fails to observe the same is a makeshift, and only postpones the day for a suitable currency through years of doubt and uncertainty.

The bill (S. 3023) of the Senate Finance Committee proposes to merely amend the present banking laws of the United States, and the bill of the House Committee on Banking and Currency (H. R. 12677) proposes a new scheme of finance altogether.

I favor the latter bill for two reasons, first, it protects depositors, and, second, it looks to a permanent plan of adequate note circulation based upon gold.

The Senate bill does not look to a permanent financial system, but proposes an arrangement which may be depended upon for a few years.

In his very able speech in the Senate recently, Senator ALDRICH said that—

> If, in the panic through which we have just passed, there had been any distrust of the value of any of the forms of our currency, or if any doubt had existed of their immediate convertibility into gold or its equivalent, or if the redemption of national-bank notes had depended upon the ability of the national banks to pay them on demand, a fatal crash would have been inevitable.

And everybody agrees with him.

This being true, the question raised by the panic is not a currency question at all. Purely and simply, it is a question of keeping that currency in circulation.

Indeed, in the very next sentence the honorable Senator admits that it was not a currency panic.

The honorable Senator also admits, on page 4 of the pamphlet containing his address, that—

> Our currency, prior to the crisis, was adequate in amount to meet all legitimate demands under normal conditions.

This completes the case that there is abundance of money if we will but secure its circulation. Just assure the depositor that his money is safe in bank and he will not put it away in secret receptacles at home. The money in the hands of the people independent of the banks is $19.36 per capita, and equals $13,000,000,000.

The reserve money held by the banks equaled eleven hundred and six thousand millions in 1907.

The panicky conditions in New York, therefore, arose because of something else than our currency system.

If the Senator wants to prevent panicky conditions in the future, he should require bankers to do a banking business and make them quit trying to beat all the speculators and gamblers to an easy thing.

The Senator says that the serious defect of our monetary system "is the fact that we have no means whatever for providing the additional issues necessary to meet or to prevent panic conditions."

Well, there is no monetary system on the earth or in the earth devised or that may be devised that would keep that New York crowd supplied with money at all times. [Laughter and applause.] For ten years Wall street has been impotent in finance, and frequently has had to call on the Secretary of the Treasury to save their financiers from themselves.

It is about time to extend the financial horizon beyond the Allegheny Mountains and take counsel of financiers who are able at all times to walk alone.

Just so long as we take our financial reckonings from Wall street just so long we will be in uncertainty and doubt. Over there they go upon the theory that one man can only make money by cheating somebody else. Out my way we believe that the correct bargain makes money for both the parties to the bargain. Out our way we never pledge a commodity to one man and sell it to another.

Another thing, I do not think the monetary conditions can be improved at any time by vitalizing the once inflated bonds of any character or kind through making them the basis of paper-money circulation.

Wall street has a large majority of conservative and correct business men, but apparently the majority has ceased to rule in that great financial street. Wall street needs a Sunday school. If such men as Henry Clews want to drive out "political dementia," as they style the antipathy to Wall street, they should assert themselves by purging their financial establishments of financial highwaymen who have unsettled the deeps of credit. In fact a little integrity in the banking business will wholly relieve us of the fear of panic and render any financial legislation unnecessary in this year of grace 1908.

As a makeshift for the next few years the Senate bill is all right, and Senator ALDRICH's speech is altogether right; and it may be true that we can not afford to go into a radical change in our financial system at this time; and it may be true also that if we will just help out Wall street every time it gambles away its money and our money, we can bridge over financial crises for several years to come.

Senator ALDRICH claims for his bill that it "will prevent panics and furnish the means of relieving panic conditions;" and I believe it will, if you can raise enough money in this way to keep the New York speculators provided with cash. If the Senator has the capacity to conceive of the capacity of the high financier when he starts out to do his best, he may be able to enlarge the money presses to equal that demand. [Laughter.] I would be willing to risk his judgment on a question of that kind, for he is usually accurate on his estimates in troublesome situations.

I would like, however, to be convinced upon a collateral question involved in his proposition to make railroad bonds and the like the basis of his note circulation, namely: Will not there be a great rush of certain railroads from one side of the country to the other to have their particular bonds preferred for this special note circulation? And will not the railroad company whose bonds are preferred for this note issue be enhanced in importance and its bonds increased in value because of this preference? And will not the Government be put to the necessity of taking over the railroad, if it should go into the hands of a receiver, in order to maintain the parity of the notes issued on its bonds? If these questions have any answers, had we not better go into the railroad business in dead earnest, go in debt for the price of the railroad? And then we shall have a bonded indebtedness sufficient to satisfy the greatest possible note circulation on the debt which will be sure to run to "kingdom come."

I can answer the above questions for myself without the least hesitation, and there are not many bankers or business men living toward the western horizon but will answer these questions as I do. The Carribean Sea is said to be always in trouble, and with such a financial scheme as this we should be tossed about with waves running mountain high and a buccaneer on every wave.

If, Mr. Chairman, we are going to do more than secure the depositors in the banks at this session of Congress, let us undertake a comprehensive view of the situation and adopt a plan which will forever fix the currency of the future. As at present advised, Mr. FOWLER's bill seems to point the way. Mr. FOWLER claims for his bill that it will—

"Unify the banking interests of the United States; secure a uniform and adequate reserve in gold coin to prove all bank credits and thereby protect the interests of all depositors; establish a scientific and simple monetary system; give the country a true credit currency system by which current credits will always increase and decrease in strict accordance with the demands of business; give to laborers, farmers, producers, manufacturers, and merchants, and to all others having bank accounts the right to have their credits in the form which will best serve their needs; give to the masses of the people just as economical and cheap credits as the rich and powerful have; establish a currency based on the products of labor and redeemable in gold coin; give to producers and merchants the opportunity to coin their commodities into the currency which the banks will be compelled to redeem in gold coin; establish in the United States Treasury a fund of approximately $700,000,000 to guarantee the redemption of these notes in gold coin and protect all depositors of national banks, thereby preventing panics and stopping the hoarding of money; completely divorce the operations of the United States Treasury from the trade and commerce of the country, and thereby prevent their continuance as a disturbing factor in business."

And if we can not undertake this comprehensive scheme of finance at this time, let us secure bank deposits now and abide our time to evolve a permanent and practical monetary system.

The State banks and the private banks of the country need not object to national banks being thus endowed, for we can postpone the operation of this national law until the legislatures of the respective States have had opportunity to meet and pass suitable legislation to secure depositors in the various State financial institutions. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I now yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH].

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, as a new Member a part of what I say may be considered in the nature of inquiry. It has appeared that this House has a lot of detail work that in a considerable measure impedes the efficiency of the main work. Of course I am not criticising the spectacular political talk, for I realize that human nature will vent itself when there is sufficient motive.

It is observable that there is an immense number of private bills, a great many of which are of a character that could be regulated by general law. Authority to construct bridges across navigable streams under ordinary circumstances could be covered by one general act that would be more adjustable to the people's immediate needs and relieve this body of the necessity of passing an act for each bridge. The purchasing of sites for and the construction of Government buildings for post-offices could be incorporated into a general act that would be impartial in its operations, so as to have that Department regulated by the amount of business in any town.

Of course in some particular cases special acts are necessary to apply to special conditions; but anyone may examine the bills introduced in this House and they will see that most of them are in the nature of special legislation to secure objects that could be more impartially worked out under fixed general laws. These facts are not mentioned because of too great a tax upon the energy of Congressmen; that is of secondary concern. The real importance is to give all people and all places the same advantages under like conditions—favoritism to none, justice to all. Whenever a need exists that exerts itself by certain well-defined conditions that are natural to arise there should be general acts that respond simultaneously to the need. In most cases special legislation is a kind of favoritism.

Whether or not a committee could be created to investigate and report on the subject of doing away with special legislation on all matters that may be properly brought within general rules of law is worthy of thought. It is not necessary to define, even if I could, the subjects that could be covered by general legislation that are now being taken care of by thousands of special bills. The principle is all that I inquire into at this time. I do not claim to know these things; I am throwing out the inquiry merely.

So much has been said upon the questions of general importance that the records are overcumbersome. I have some hesitancy in aggravating the situation; but if there is anything unsaid that one wants to say, it is justified if it is in the interest of a district whose demands are consistent with the general good of the great commonwealth.

In my district there is a well-defined impression that the problems requiring early and active attention are finance, tariff, and reasonable regulation of transportation. There is a positive sentiment that transportation should be so regulated as to prevent discrimination for or against person or place. This is considered even more important than the fixing of the rates. On the tariff question there is a determined sentiment that there should be an immediate revision downward. There is some impatience with the dilatory practice in the passing of such laws as will respond to the common needs. There is a feeling that too much time is taken up with special legislation that looks after the interest of the few with a seeming neglect of those questions that affect all the people. These questions are all broad.

At this time I confine my further remarks to the financial question. I have heard discussed on the floor of this House and I have read and studied several of the bills introduced on this subject. I get the impression that some of their authors are not taking into consideration the actual conditions that develop with an expanding business and the reverse conditions that take place in a contracting business, and this leads me to make a few remarks on first principles, leading up to actual practice.

I think before I get through I will demonstrate that our late panic has no relation with political party or parties, and I think, further, that it can be clearly demonstrated to any impartial, observing mind that the acts of President Roosevelt in checking up and calling to account the evil practices of some of the corporations have saved the country from a far greater panic that would have soon taken place if these concerns had been permitted to go on uninterrupted in laying their foundations to sap the substance and appropriate the energy of the well-meaning and law-abiding people.

Unfortunately a large number of people who are innocent of any knowledge of unlawful acts of some of these corporations invested in their stocks. Our sympathies are naturally with them, but the whole question has a broader aspect; it goes to the foundation of our social institutions and this is by far the over-important consideration. The interest of these investors, who are few in comparison with the great body of people, must be subordinate to the general good. There is no vested right in the holders of stocks to have the value of those stocks maintained in spite of the evil practices of the corporation management, and if the question arises under such circumstances, where there is a conflict in the interest of the commonwealth with a limited number of stockholders, the commonwealth interest must prevail. The investment in stocks is not such an innocent undertaking as to require the protection that we would expect for children going to school. When an investor takes his money and hands it over and receives a certificate of stock in return, the burden should be upon him to see the he gets value for his investment. If he has placed his money in the hands of sharks it is hardly consistent with the interests of the common people for them to bear his burdens for his misjudgment. In other words, when a party buys stocks let him take all the chances of the investment and not saddle any part of it on the public who has taken no part in it.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LINDBERGH. I have such a short time I will desire to use it all.

If in the last two years we had had a President who would have been satisfied to let things run along to the satisfaction of the corporate interests referred to, it is certain that these interests would have undermined our institutions. They would have concealed their evil practices and kept the general public ignorant up to the present time, and probably for some little time to come, but it is absolutely certain that if they could have had their way they would have worked up a still greater bull market, until the conditions were ripe to produce a panic of their own plan, when they would have been ready to get out from under and let all the losses fall upon the common people, whereas in the present panic, which came before they were quite ready, the losses have been sustained by the rich to a far greater extent than has occurred in any previous panic, and for this relief the people have to thank Theodore Roosevelt.

A condition had developed that created a general feeling among old and young that independence and success were no longer copartners. It is only a short time since the young man starting out in life understood that things had come to such a state that for him to reach any high goal he would have to combine with those in power, irrespective of moral considerations, in order to obtain any desired end. He felt that uninterrupted expression of high and clean thoughts might disqualify him for the favor of those in control.

To no small extent were the youth of our land smothered in the development of high ideals, in their knowledge that business success in so many cases followed schemes and trickery. Some one had to come forward as an example of moral and truthful independence and succeed on that example. There was a man equal to the emergency, and the thanks of the country are due to that man to-day that in every little hamlet are independent thinkers and speakers, and morality is again at a premium in the minds of our young people. The greater panic that would have come from under the influence and guidance of the special interests, if it had awaited their time, is averted. Even if these interests, that are so sore with the President, were stating the truth when they say the President's public, open expressions contributed to the panic, I would nevertheless be satisfied in the fact that it was precipitated at a time when they had to bear a heavy part of the burdens, instead of saddling all on the common people. Their big game of being ready for every panic went amiss in this last panic.

Mr. WILLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LINDBERGH. I have so little time——

Mr. WILLETT. I just want to ask one question of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LINDBERGH. It is the only time I may speak this year and I have only a few minutes, and I am sorry I can not do so. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield now in the short time I have——

Mr. WEISSE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLETT. The gentleman has yielded two minutes of his time for that purpose.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman has no time to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. And has not been recognized by the Chair. The gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Passing these general considerations and taking up a more minute consideration of the situation, I make the statement that panics are more likely to occur in the most highly developed systems of credit. In a country like ours there is the greatest progress, and the tendency is to take the maximum of risk, which is constantly stimulated by maximum opportunities. The danger of money panics increases in the direct ratio to our opportunities and our enterprise. On the whole, the wonder is that our general banking system is so strong, for it must be admitted that our banking laws are quite imperfect. Our greatest need is to root out bad banking, not only promoters, but also those who do not protect their depositors by moderating their loans prudently.

The guaranty of bank deposits is practically a new idea. How far it will develop into actual practice is difficult to tell. There is very respectful support for such a general system. The guaranty by State or nation of bank deposits has no greater foundation in principle than a general guaranty of certain returns or profit in any other legitimate investment. But there may be conditions that run through the body politic that would make the guaranty of deposits a public policy. We have just seen the results of the panic in depreciating the value of property and stifling industry, causing immense loss. The loss has been so great that the cost to the people in a guaranty of bank deposits would be inconsequential in comparison, provided such a guaranty will insure against panics. Understand me, when I say cost to the people I do not forget it is the intention that the banks shall pay to create a guaranty fund, but we all know that any direct tax on an industry, work, or need, in the long run, on the law of general average, is assessed to the consumer. The Government must recognize that as a principle.

I have grave fears as to the ultimate success of a guaranty of bank deposits. In the first place, unless there should be some provision prohibiting certain kinds of speculation, or unless human nature should change, even the guaranty of bank deposits will not prevent panics, but would simply defer the day by postponing the hour of fear; for, by the very nature of things, when a bull market starts, the momentum continues until it reaches a point when economically a breakdown is inevitable.

On the legitimate industrial pursuits of the country there is both theoretical and practical possibility of a self-sustained credit system, based upon money foundation; but when you inject into that the complication of speculative gambling, the more we reenforce the system of credit, so as to give unguarded confidence, the greater is the opportunity of the gambling speculators to fleece us by keeping up the bull market.

I do not mean to disparage the value of confidence based on solid economic conditions, but I want to emphasize the necessity of the value of the sufficient lack of confidence on the part of the people to cause them to scrutinize carefully the way the Wall street interests manipulate things. Just as sure as we leave that Wall street gambling contingent with its allied banks in a position where it can throw its influence into the markets, we are going to have our occasional troubles. To me it seems better to have a checking up of accounts more often and have panics less desperate.

I admit that if the Government had put its guaranty back of all the deposits on October last, and continued that guaranty, the panic would not yet be here, but the rotten places that caused it would not have been eradicated. Speculative parasites oversubscribed the credit and crowded out legitimate industry by overbidding. Had our credit been still more expansive, and if the people had deposited even a much greater part of their pocket money, industry could have stayed in a while longer, but the growth of the parasites would have eventually monopolized the credit. Yes; those same parasites would have pushed the bull game, would have tossed up the prices until even a Government guaranty would not hold back a panic. Such a panic when it came would be greater in its severity in proportion to the overbulled market and might ultimately destroy the credit of the Government. We must not forget that confidence is the stock in trade and capital of the gambling bulls (and we must not give them too much of it), nor should we forget that distrust is the stock in trade and capital of the gambling bears, and that these two sets of speculators are watching us common people with the keenest eyes. They rob us on both rising and falling markets. The bulls catch us going up and the bears coming back. There is no satisfactory remedy against panics in creating confidence unless we can eliminate this vicious class of speculators. In other words, we need confidence in legitimate enterprise and distrust in predatory speculation. Roosevelt recognizes that principle as all important, as is clearly seen by his strenuous prosecution of so many law-violating corporations. We common people must not be so confident as to allow the class of people I have referred to to work the confidence game on us to our own ruin.

Another reason why I doubt the advisability of such a system is that under our present loose system of examining banks the doors are left open for easy trickery which makes it possible for sharpers to rob the people. Let me illustrate: Under our present system it is practicable, though fraudulent, for ten men to combine and start a national bank with 50 per cent of the capital, and out of deposits that they may secure immediately borrow enough to recoup their 50 per cent and, in addition, enough to fully pay up their stock so as to leave no capital in the bank except their promissory notes.

The same men can repeat that operation by starting a hundred banks in that many different towns and not have a dollar invested. Not only that, with the loose way in which banks are examined they can put into the banks notes of irresponsible parties to take up the deposits as rapidly as they are made. There is nothing to prevent it except the bank examiners. I have seen an examiner enter a bank in the morning and finish his examination the same day, covering a business of several hundred thousand dollars, without finding out one thing about the bills receivable, so far as the responsibility of the makers is concerned. I have seen this happen again and again in various banks. In the majority of cases that I have observed if the bankers had not been men of integrity and responsibility they could have easily done all that I have stated before. It is to the great credit of our country bankers that there is so little actual bad practice.

From what I have said it may easily be seen what abuses could go on under a system that could easily be adopted by a few schemers. In fact, some of them could so arrange it that some one representing them would have upon the books of the banks in their control large deposits in book account only, never having actually deposited any money covered by the class of notes before referred to, and those deposits, under a guaranty system, would be protected unless the fraud could be established.

If we must disturb principles that are fundamental we should move with great caution. I think that, if there is to be a guaranty of bank deposits, there should be a limit of the amount of the deposit of any one individual in any one bank. I am not in favor of a guaranty of deposits of hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars owned by single individuals. As to what the limit of deposits guaranteed should be is a mere question of policy. In my judgment it should not exceed $1,000 to any one individual in any one bank. But even that provision would have its dangers, for those with large deposits, if they became frightened, might make a run for the excess and defeat the very objects of the law. Such law, again, would put the careful, conservative, able, and honest bankers, from the standpoint of securing deposits, on the same footing as the careless, indifferent, or even the dishonest banker. It would create a carelessness among depositors as to where they should place their deposits.

I think I have given sufficient reasons to show my lack of confidence in the guaranty of bank deposits. I do not, however, wish to convey the idea that I would not vote for such a system if there is a general demand for the same by the people. In fact, if there is I would vote for it, but with a good deal of apprehension that some time in the future such a law would work to disadvantage.

Let us suppose, for instance, that on October last, instead of a lack of confidence, the people had had entire confidence, so much so that they had deposited in the banks and with trust companies most of the $1,666,000,000 that they had in circulation among them not in the banks. What would have happened? The banks would have invited loans from everywhere they thought they had a fair show of getting them back. You would now see such a boom and inflation as has never been known in the history of the world. That might continue two, three, or four years. What do you suppose the gambling contingent would be doing during that time? Everybody knows. Will somebody answer where a guaranty of bank deposits would land us under such conditions?

The United States requires a system that will make the capital of the country available to develop its natural physical conditions. Everybody desires to encourage enterprise. But in enterprise there is a tendency to bull everything, and as the country is honeycombed with speculators of a gambling instinct, these speculators are constantly interfering with the equilibrium; constantly the mark is being overshot. Setbacks are the economic penalty.

There is no fixed science about money and credit, except so far as we can evolve it out of experience. Human nature cuts a great swath on this subject, and as human nature is not steady, neither is money or credit, for the value of both are more or less seated in the human brain.

Money properly is simply a convenient means of exchange, and from that view point would require no greater volume than to meet the balances of trade. Money practically is not only a means of exchange, but is used as an actual commodity, and thereby complicates its use for exchange. As an exchange, the amount required to handle business varies with the volume of business and with the confidence and credit. The latter is the principal means or agent, but money is the parent.

I deduct the following base subjects for my thought in detail on this question:

Money as a means of exchange.

Money as a commodity.

Credit as exchange expressed in money terms.

If these points are kept in mind I think my suggestions will be understood.

Money as a means of exchange is simply the transit of money from one person or party to another to pay balances in commercial trade, and when used in that sense and for that purpose is a measure, and the balance paid forms a specific fund that may be used for any purpose instead of a limited credit.

Money as a commodity is a much more complex consideration. We may pass the question of value, for we have a fixed standard that is generally approved and is not the subject of present inquiry.

Money when used as a reserve is simply a commodity and not of direct value in making exchanges, though it has its influence on values.

Bank reserves are created to inspire confidence and for the purpose of being prepared for emergencies. It is used for the confidence, but seldom for the emergency. The piling up of reserves exaggerates panics in panic times. Pocket money, or change, which is carried by the people and kept in their homes, is simple reserve for direct trade, and so are the moneys carried in business houses which are to take care of their daily business. These several locations of money are very important to consider and distinguish their relations with any financial distress.

To me it looks very clear that our late panic was the direct result of having practically used up all the liquid capital—that is, the exchange capital—in taking care of the expanding business that was the outgrowth of prosperity. In other words, money got panicky because prosperity overtook the floating supply. The following I consider the evolution of it:

October 1, 1907, there was in circulation $32.46 per capita outside of the Treasury, total	$2,805,854,374
In 1897 there was in circulation $22.49 per capita, total	1,640,200,000
Increase in ten years	1,165,654,374
In 1907 there was in the hands of the people outside of the banks and trust companies	1,666,500,000
In 1897 the amount was	877,000,000
Increase in ten years	789,500,000
The bank and trust companies' deposits in 1907 were	13,099,600,000
In 1897 they were	5,111,126,229
Increase in ten years	7,988,473,771

These latter figures require special notice. The increase in the legal reserve required to protect that increase in deposits is said to be $478,000,000, or about 6 per cent—low, to say the least.

It must be noticed that reserves are not usually kept at a minimum by conservative banks and trust companies. It is a conservative estimate that for the increased deposits in the ten years it required between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000, or, in other words, dead money taken out of the general exchanges serving merely as commodity.

The clearing-house banks of the city of New York on February 21, 1907, held $32,668,550 more than their 25 per cent required reserve and that is increased from day to day and could all be loaned out to go into commerce, but sentiment at this time is so uncertain that it is held to fortify against possible unfavorable developments.

The increase of money outside of the Treasury from 1897 to 1907 was $1,165,554,374. This, deducting the amount of increase in the hands of the people, $789,000,000, leaves the increase money in the control of the banks and trust companies $376,354,000 over what they had ten years before; but the banks and trust companies were required to keep practically in their vaults an additional reserve on the increased deposits of over $500,000,000, thus making a reduction of the available cash for general exchange use in these institutions of at least $175,000,000 for the ten years.

It will therefore be noted that with the expansion of bank credits there was an actual contraction of available cash in the banks as a basis for the great credit system of exchange carried on through the banks.

I have stated that the available cash for the basis of exchange credit has been reduced approximately $175,000,000 on account of the increased reserves required to be maintained on increased deposits. That statement requires the qualification, that our laws establish a false system of reserve by counting as reserve the money that one bank deposits in another, which other may deposit one-half of that in still another, and all three banks count the same as reserve. By this system we deceive ourselves on the reserve and we do not have in cash the amount of reserve that is generally supposed. There is no doubt that our reserve system is wrong. It has proven so in every panic, and now it is proposed in a measure to correct it by requiring banks to keep more of their own reserves in their own vaults.

There are many ways in which that will be a benefit to the country, not the least of which is that it will not get into the hands of the bulls and bears to operate against the people. It will especially be of advantage to the country districts and to the smaller towns, but caution will have to be exercised in the shift from our present wrong system to a correct system; because if such a law were to take effect to-day, requiring each bank and trust company to keep its reserve where it belongs—in its own vaults—they would have to make an immediate call for that money from the reserve agent; and if it were immediately enforced, we would have another panic on our hands, and there would be more commodity money come out of the exchange money which could only be secured in two ways—from the people by securing some additional deposits out of the money they carry in their pockets, their houses, etc., or by creation of new money. Note that fact, for it had a material bearing on the panic. I am proving to you that the panic was not a party panic—that is, we had to stop and check up and give account.

We know from statistics that the commercial business of the country is done on more than 90 per cent credit. It is stated to be $19 credit for every dollar of money. It must be considered that the money in the hands of the people, not in the hands of and with the trust companies, is money that enters almost exclusively into cash transactions, and that the great volume of credit is based upon the exchanges made through the banks, and probably exceeds nine-tenths of all the credit business. Therefore the reduction of the live—that is, the available—cash in the control of the banks over $175,000,000 is a very material consideration in this financial question.

On the 1st of October last if the people had deposited $175,000,000 out of the $789,000,000 increase in their hands the available cash for business and commercial use through the banks would have been about the same as it was ten years before. If the people had continued to allow the banks to hold that additional deposit it would have formed a basis for further credit expansion in possibly $2,000,000,000 additional credits. That together with the ordinary increase of money and its expansion into credit would, other things being equal, have deferred the panic period maybe several years. But human nature shows that it all would be discounted and panic would come even in spite of good physical conditions.

Now, we can talk all we please, there is no complete remedy in any law or in any party. In spite of all, men or party, or physical condition, we will go with unerring certainty into alternate periods of expansion and contraction in credit, which will influence for good or bad the development of our physical resources. The physical conditions do affect particular times when these periods take effect and are frequently the prime cause. Physical conditions, however, were not the prime cause of our late panic. The physical conditions were right for continued prosperity, but speculation and development overtook and smothered the exchange agency—money and credit and speculation made readjustment impossible without reaction; speculation had to receive a backset. Speculative gamblers were dissatisfied with the criticisms of the President on deception and fraudulent practice and tried to strike back by charging the panic to him, but the panic was due to credit conditions, and all the President and the Administration could do was to give relief to prevent it from becoming worse. Germany had a panic practically the same time, but her panic was caused by too much money, and of course different excuses are offered to account for that.

It seems to me there is no complete remedy, but there is within the power of legal regulation a controlling influence, so that when we have reached the maximum of credit based on the available cash and the warning is sounded, we can check back to normal through the great reserve system without destroying so excessively the well-earned means of the common people. It must be remembered that all the money in existence is a mere bagatelle compared with the everyday well-directed energy of the people and that the great success of mankind depends upon the uninterrupted application of that energy.

In the beginning of the recovery from what is known as the "panic of '93," labor had been unoccupied on a large scale, and we common people had used up a large part of our pocket reserve. It had gone to those from whom we had to buy our necessities and through them to their creditors, and finally most of it found lodging in banks and trust companies. Vast debts had been liquidated and contraction was at its limit. It had run its course. Production had to commence, and with that a demand for labor, raw material, and the finished products. Everything that started created a necessity for additional things and we were all on the highway to expansion. We who had used up our pocket reserve got employment and filled our pockets again with more than we ever had. Still there was more work than we could do, for when we worked ourselves we needed and could use more goods and could have more luxuries. Therefore, more work was required to supply those. Foreigners came in by the millions to help us work, and they filled their pockets with change. This change, or pocket money, had to come from new money or from the money that had been piled up in the banks and with the trust companies.

As before stated there was $789,000,000 more money in the people's hands in 1907 than there was in 1897. They had earned and got possession of that much more money that they did not deposit in banks or with trust companies. That money was used not for credit but for cash business and has all the time taken care of itself. It took no part in exaggerating the panic and probably not a great deal in relieving it. But it was quite convenient to have out among the people when the banks were not paying out money.

The money secured from the banks at first was principally taken to operate producing plants all the way from the farm to the great factories and also went into the great systems of railways. Most of these concerns—that is, the factories and railways—had to be operated largely on credit. In the process the money was borrowed from the banks and trust companies, but was left on deposit to be checked out. These checks were deposited also, but every time a deposit is made a proper reserve must be created. The duplication of deposits in the banks and with trust companies, was exceedingly rapid as is seen by the ten years' growth. When this demand for money for legitimate use in producing began, there was a simultaneous speculative demand and the bankers and trust companies took care of these speculators also. If the gambling speculators had been excluded from receiving credit no panic would have been due for many years to come and money panics would never be so acute were it not for the gambling contingent of the speculating interests.

The facilities with which banks make exchanges is so well conducted that checks and drafts have been the principal means of conducting business. They are practically the same as money for purposes of paying balances. In no other place in the world is there so much elasticity in bank credits; but, as we have observed, the greater the amount of credits the greater the amount of necessary reserve.

Reserve is to protect, but under our system there is little authority to use it. The strictly legal reserve held by the banks and trust companies has been treated as a sort of a semisacred fund. Grover Cleveland, I think, was the first to make conspicuous practical use of our Government gold reserve. He knew what reserve was for. Prior to his use of the gold reserve the near approach to the minimum reserve was the point at which the people took fright. He taught the people the use of that reserve.

During the October-November panic the bank reserves served opposite purposes; one to aggravate the panic by tying up and enlarging the reserves at the expense of general circulation; the other to create confidence by reason of the size of the reserve. The people saw the reserve and knew that it was all that was left. They, of course, wanted that and demanded it. It was in the banks for the protection of the depositors, the reserve really belonged to them, but to pay it out would have endangered the banks. The bank could not use it for the people, because they thought they would burst if they did, and the people were, many of them, bursting because they did not. The idea is, "the banks will be damned if they do, and the people will be damned if they don't." The people were really the ones who were damned if they had any debts to pay or goods to sell.

If the reserve could have been generally used in a checking-back system to cancel credits and debits, the panic would not have cost the people such sacrifices. Cleveland's example of using the gold reserve in the United States Treasury had not served as an example to educate the people how to practically use bank reserves.

The reserves of banks and trust companies are intensely important and should not be weakened in any respect; but I confess that when we find banks that are solvent, under both ordinary and extraordinary circumstances, and a panic comes along, and they have their gilt paper and good cash and are not allowed to use the latter to help bridge over the emergency, that reserve is too mighty exclusively reserve to fit the exigencies of the sick days of October and November. The banks of New York City, however much they may be blamed for some phases of the situation, were not so much amiss on that, for they made some use of the reserve and saved the country from what would have been a more serious panic if they had refrained from its use.

I do not advance that idea as a commendation of the New York banks, but merely to show their understanding of the value of reserve. The New York banks were grossly instrumental in causing the panic by diverting the money of the country from its legitimate uses and placing it with the speculative gambling interests, but after the panic was on and they were in distress they used the most effective means, lawful and unlawful, to check it.

I do not want to be misconstrued on this reserve question. I do not in any way want to weaken the reserve system; I would rather strengthen it. It should never be reduced below the minimum for the purpose of expanding business; but when the limit of credit has been reached and the people become frightened and reaction sets in in such violence as to destroy the substantial substance of the people, the reserve should then serve as a checking-back agency for the purpose of liquidation to regain normal conditions. That may be done with great satisfaction to the people and saving to the banks under proper regulations.

When a panic is in sight, everybody gives it a boost by trying to collect and pile up reserves. The banks are helpless under the pressure. They can not be otherwise. The President, candidates for future Presidents, the public press, and many others in positive terms pointed the finger of disapproval toward all who withdrew their money from the banks for the purpose of hoarding, and at the same time pointed to the piling up of reserves in the banks with approval, as showing their solvent condition. How was the ordinary citizen to know that his money was safe, when so many institutions were refusing to pay out money? There is no doubt that the withdrawal of funds from the banks aggravated the panic; neither is there any doubt that the piling up of reserves by demanding payment of everything that could be collected, irrespective of sacrifice, also aggravated the panic.

The reserve system is not properly handled and works to the injury of the people. The test comes in a panic, when the reserve is most needed. At such times what we now call reserve is reserve practically only when in the control of the banks for whose depositors the reserve is kept, and with a right to use it within proper regulation, as the New York banks made use of it in spite of regulations and in violation of law. I know of no way in which I can better state this than to quote from a late speech by Senator NELSON:

> The only way the bankers stopped the panic was by breaking the law by suspending payment, holding up the entire country. That is the modern way of stopping a panic, and it is an easy way of stopping it, if people submit to it. If the First National Bank of Alexandria, my own home, had suspended during that panic and refused to pay, as it did not, the Comptroller of the Currency would have been swift to have put it into the hands of a receiver and wound it up. But when these great city banks all in a body resorted to this system and held up their depositors in the manner they did, no action was taken. Senators, you can see that that system of stopping a panic was very effective, but it is the most lawless and revolutionary method of stopping a panic I have ever known.

The Senator deals with the New York end of the panic in clear terms that our country people should fully understand.

That reserve is not actual reserve except when kept where it belongs—that is, in the bank for which it is reserve—is shown in the past panics when reserve and central reserve banks refused cash to the country banks to which reserve deposits were due. Reserve should all be kept in the place where it is required in the event of its need, with the exception of possibly a small amount for exchange. It should never be in other banks for loaning purposes.

If the country banks get too much money, they should loan on commercial paper as near home as good paper may be had, instead of piling money up in the reserve cities. When it gets into the latter places it enters into speculation. Much of it is used to buy control of the actual necessities of the people. When such control is secured, capital is created upon the needs of the people. Their necessities are taxed up to them and then again when they need the money to move their crops, the very money that has been deposited in their own banks has been transferred to reserve cities, and when demand is made for it such a demand creates a stringency that reduces the price of what the people have to sell. Their own local money is sent away and can not be called back without depressing the market. They are hit both going and coming.

We country people scarcely realize that the money deposited in our local banks, by its transfer from the local banks to the reserve cities, a large part of it goes into marginal dealings in Chicago and New York and enables the gamblers in stocks and grains to take advantage of our necessities in a thousand different ways and to boom the great cities and their gamblers in such a way as to make them an uneconomical tax upon the energies of the people.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHANEY], who has just addressed the House, stated that the banks of New York could absorb all the money that the people could pour in there. He is right. One of the principal means of absorbing it is in the speculation that costs the country so dearly. I am a believer in the people keeping their money in the banks. Great good has come to the people and to the country by that system, but we would have had this benefit more equitably distributed under a reserve system that would have kept more of the money at the places of production or where it was earned.

This is the people's question. It is a question of seeing the trouble and regulating it as well as judgment will permit.

We can not undertake to increase currency on nothing, for to do that will complicate values to the advantage of the few and the detriment of the many. In some way there must be a check to overspeculation and to overdevelopment—that is, development should meet the conditions that respond to the people's needs. There is no amount of money that could be injected into circulation that would prevent panics; for whatever money is put into circulation enters into calculations of speculation and business and an adjustment is made to it. It is a question of governing influence and an application of remedies that control demands within legitimate purposes and as far as possible to cut out improper speculation. What show does the legitimate industrial business have when the Wall street gamblers bid the price of money up as high as 125 per cent? Last October the gamblers had to have it, even if it sent all of the industrial plants, farm, and laborer on the bum. No industry could bid against such odds. Nothing but gambling would attempt to meet that, and that was one thing that prevented the central reserve banks of New York from paying the deposits belonging to the country banks. This last panic was the result of using up the liquid capital. It had all gone into enterprise and speculation. It may be impossible to provide any means to bring overspeculation and overdevelopment back to normal conditions without financial disturbance, but there should be, and probably are, more ways than one in which such disturbances may be checked to prevent such demoralizing effects as have occurred in the past.

We know that in October and November, without material physical change, there was a sudden disturbance in the movement of money, and with that disturbance credit was destroyed to an extent that seriously embarrassed our industries. We know that under the influence of that disturbance the price of all products on the farm declined enormously.

I will outline in general terms what seems to me a safe, simple, and effective plan for a bond-secured emergency currency, payable in gold and at a rate of interest large enough to insure its retirement when the emergency is past and not so large as to prevent free use:

Authorize the Comptroller of the Currency to have printed in proper way currency bills in proper denominations, to be legal tender for all purposes except interest on the public debt and in redemption of the national currency, such notes to be on hand in the Treasury of the United States and put out into circulation in the following manner:

Any banking association applying to become a creditor entitled to a loan of said bills shall first satisfy the Comptroller, by such proceedings as the Comptroller may establish, of the solvency of the bank and that its capital and surplus are unimpaired. Said association shall deposit with the Treasurer of the United States its promissory note for such amount as it may desire credit in said bills, which note shall by its terms be payable to the United States in gold on demand and bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable on the 1st days of January and July of each year—the interest, however, to be computed as I indicate later.

Any banking association depositing its notes to submit therewith a list of securities in an amount to exceed by at least 10 per cent the bank's note or notes, bonds, or other interest-bearing obligations payable in gold of any State of the United States, or any legally authorized bonds issued for municipal purposes by any town, city, district, or county in the United States which has been in existence for a period of ten years, and which for a period of ten years previous to such deposits has not defaulted in the payment of any part of either principal or interest of any funded debt authorized to be contracted by it, and which has at such date more than 1,200 inhabitants, as established by the last national census, and whose net indebtedness does not exceed 10 per cent of the valuation of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the last preceding valuation of property for the assessment of taxes. The Treasurer of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may accept for the purposes of this act herein enumerated, in such proportions as he may from time to time determine, bonds not less than 10 per cent in excess of the bank's note or notes, and he may at any time require the deposit of additional security or require any association to change the character of securities already on deposit, and shall at the end of, say, five years require that all bonds not issued and sold by the States and municipalities after the passage, such bonds shall be substituted by bonds that are issued and sold after the date of the passage of such act. No bonds deposited shall draw interest at less than 2 per cent per annum, and any bonds that are deposited that bear interest at less than 3 per cent shall require 15 per cent in excess of the credit given the bank for the use of the Treasury bills; and provided further, that no bonds of any kind required shall be received as security unless the principal and interest are payable in gold.

That all bonds deposited to secure the bank's note or notes issued should be transferred to the Treasurer of the United States in trust for the association depositing them, with a memorandum to that effect attached to or written or printed upon each bond and signed by the cashier or some other officer of the association making the deposit. A receipt should be given the association by the Comptroller of the Currency, or by a clerk appointed by him for that purpose, stating that such bond securities are held in trust for the association upon whose behalf the transfer is made and as security for the payment of the bills authorized to be loaned to such association that have been or may be delivered to such association. No assignment or transfer of any such bonds by the Treasurer should be deemed valid unless countersigned by the Comptroller of the Currency. The provisions of sections 5163, 5164, 5165, 5166, and 5167 of the Revised Statutes, respecting United States bonds deposited to secure circulating notes should, except as modified, be applicable to all bonds deposited.

Any banking association that should comply with such provisions should be entitled to receive credit with the United States Treasurer for the Treasury bills and have the right on demand to receive in such bills the full or any fractional part that would be to the credit of such banking association, and should pay interest to the Treasurer of the United States at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on the amount received from the time of receipt until paid, such interest to be paid as before stated; provided, however, that interest upon any bills taken out by the banking association in the last four months of any year and paid before February 1 following should be satisfied by the payment of 1 per cent on the amount of such bills. The same process could be repeated from time to time and repaid in full or by installments.

The Comptroller of the Currency, whenever he should deem the security insufficient, should notify the banking association to deposit additional security, and in case of failure to furnish such additional security such banking association should be required to pay the Government for all bills charged to such association, and in case of failure to pay action be instituted upon the note of the bank for such amount as would be due to the Government for bills loaned, or bonds could be sold to pay same, or both.

Whenever a banking association should wish to withdraw any bonds deposited as security, it could pay to the Government such amount as would be due and withdraw such securities.

Any national banking association not in a reserve or central reserve city that would comply with such provisions, and stood credited with and entitled to receive on demand the bills authorized, might be allowed to reduce the reserve of such bank to 10 per cent of their deposits, provided that nine-tenths thereof shall remain in cash in the bank vaults; and provided further, that the Treasury bills the bank would be entitled to receive on demand should be at least double the amount of the deficit in the reserve below the 15 per cent legal requirement; and provided further, that no bank should make time loans when its reserve is below the 15 per cent requirement. A provision could also be made that reserve and central reserve banks could reduce their reserve in the same way by using the funds to pay their depositors that are counted in the reserve of other banks.

Embodied in these suggestions that I have made are some ideas of a way in which an elastic currency may be secured that would favor crop-moving seasons and work to the advantage of farmers and the general public, and would not disturb general values.

The last four months of the year the United States emergency bills could be taken out at a cost of 1 per cent on their face if the funds to redeem are paid into the Treasury on or before the 1st day of February following. Thus, if these emergency bills were taken out on the 1st day of September, they could run without redemption till February 1, five months for 1 per cent, plus the cost of printing, which would always be a cheap crop-moving currency, and would prevent a stringency occurring every fall at the time when a farmer must sell. The rate of 6 per cent on all emergency bills not taken out on the last four months of the year and paid before the following February 1 would be sufficient to prevent absorption by speculation.

It is not likely that emergency currency would be resorted to every year, but whenever the necessity existed it would be available. The very fact that it may be had would be likely to remove the necessity, for if bankers had some safeguard, in case the necessity arises, they will not be frightened into hoarding money as they were in the last panic.

The reserve of banks is, under our present system, considered "the dead line." When a bank's reserve is impaired, it is subject to be closed, unless repaired quickly. The bank may be perfectly solvent, but the reserve which is there to protect the depositor, if used for the purpose for which it is created, will compel the bank to close its doors and defeat the object. It would seem that a properly regulated system may provide a safe elasticity to the reserve, so as to make a part of the reserve available for emergencies, but the use of any part of the reserve should be the suggesting point for caution, and should be so fortified as to make its own corrections by being attended with such conditions as to make it financially expedient to bring the reserve to its normal. In line with that idea, it is suggested that we take notice of a well-known fact—that is, that every fall a stringency occurs in crop-moving season that materially injures the agricultural districts and in some measure affects disadvantageously general business. It is therefore suggested that under the plan outlined, and as an auxiliary to the system, provision be made that when any national bank has deposited its note or notes and collaterals as first suggested it shall not be required to actually take from the Treasury of the United States emergency bills; and that when such bank notes and collaterals are deposited and the United States emergency bills are not taken, but remain in the Treasury, the reserve of such banks may be reduced by a use of a part of the reserve to liquidate obligations, provided that the United States emergency bills the bank is entitled to receive on demand shall be at least double the amount of the deficit in the reserve below the regular requirement; and further provided, that no bank shall make new time loans when its reserve is below the regular requirement.

That is, if the bank is entitled to immediately receive emergency currency, and leaves the same in the control of the Government, it may use a part of its reserve, provided it can immediately supply a larger sum of emergency currency. The banks should not be required to pay interest on emergency bills until they are made current and should be required to take no more than they require.

The prohibition of new time loans being made when the reserve is not complete may be a sufficient provision to bring the reserve to normal.

The low interest suggested for crop-moving seasons to favor directly the farmer, and indirectly all the people, would create a special incentive to the banks to be prepared, for the same security would fortify them with the means to protect their depositors far better than the present system of keeping of the reserve in reserve banks, where it has been proven in the last panics that it does not serve the purpose of reserve. The higher rate to take effect in all emergency currency not made current and paid between September 1 and February 1 would create the financial expediency to bring the reserve back to its normal and check any speculative movement.

A great indirect advantage in such a system would be the market that would be created for municipal bonds, which would naturally be classed in the favorable and approved security for emergency bills. Every school district, town, village, county, and State could sell its bonds at a better price, and taxes would be much less, and at the same time provision would be made to secure the emergency currency.

Our General Government pays less interest and gets better price for its bonds than any other government of the world, because the bonds secure a part of our money system. The people have saved more than all the greenbacks now outstanding over what the bonds would have sold for without that advantage. Our 2 per cent bonds sell at a premium, while the English and German government bonds, at a higher rate of interest and probably equally as safe for interest purposes, sell far below par.

The example of the demand created for Government bonds by their guaranteeing the circulation of the banks, is sufficient to illustrate in a degree the advantage that would be given to municipal bonds if they could furnish the reenforcement to an emergency currency.

I do not attempt to figure to exactness, or to exact amounts and special details, for the main idea is to give a general plan for thoughtful consideration.

The country has a chance to relieve itself from a bad banking reserve system that takes too much of the people's funds to the city of New York, there to be expended in extravagance, speculation, and in every way imaginable, and when needed by the people who have the greatest right to it, their demands create a stringency and in some cases a panic.

This is especially a good time to enact a law based upon some sound basis to prevent as far as possible future sudden money panics. The money panic will be over and barring unforeseen possibilities, money will soon be cheap. While money is cheap the banks can, before emergency arises, place themselves in readiness for future needs, and that without incumbrance or inconvenience.

It will be beter for the country banks, if they can get advantage of certain reserve rights based upon municipal bonds, to have the people's money invested in those bonds than it is for them to keep excessive reserve funds in New York at 1½ and 2 per cent.

I have not suggested any compulsory provisions, but merely provisions to be utilized by reason of their expediency.

It is impossible for anyone, or any aggregation, to determine by a fixed minimum or maximum amount the volume of money and credit this great country of ours is going to require. It is not necessary so far as emergency currency is concerned, for we can fix upon a system that will automatically adjust to our development.

We can fix certain taxes and penalties on the issue of money for special purposes to cover emergencies, so as to naturally and under financial expediency adjust to the law of general averages. The needs of the common people, the aggregate of mankind, must be our guide.

I suggest that in any legislation care must be exercised to avoid legislating value that naturally belongs to the people into the hands of individuals. It is not justice to the people to increase the value of outstanding bonds by creating an additional demand for them, nor is it just to create an unnatural demand for private bonds; therefore, the proper thing to do in fixing upon the bonds to be accepted by the Government for its promise to meet future outstanding obligations to be created for emergencies are the bonds of the people—schools, towns, villages, cities, counties, and States. These bonds, of course, must stand the test of proper investigation. Upon the taking effect of such a law there should be no bonds in existence, except unsold municipal bonds, that could secure a boon out of the law.

There are new bonds of municipalities being issued to promote new developments and to meet maturing bonds. Such new bonds would be in greater demand, and the people would reap the benefit of the demand which they themselves thus create. The new bonds in all probability would come on fast enough, but to forestall any possible emergency which might arise before they may be had the temporary use of other bonds could be provided for. Such possible necessity for temporary use of other bonds would not create a demand at the expense of the people.

It would be wrong to limit the acceptable bonds to municipalities of 20,000 population. This is a country made up of units, and the small districts, villages, and towns, etc., have the same general rights as the city or district of 20,000, and the banks in these smaller towns should not be compelled to desert their home localities in the investments of funds that naturally belong to the particular locality.

Whenever a village, district, or town sells its bonds, if their systems are in proper shape and sound, they should be as much respected by the law as the city of New York or other large cities.

Every part of our country has the right to the advantage of the operation of any general law, and the Government should not create by law a monopoly in the emergency-currency plan in favor of banks with a 20 per cent surplus capital. A surplus may properly be considered in the amount a bank would be entitled to circulate, but any bank with unimpaired capital should be entitled to the currency in proportion to the unimpaired capital.

New banks should not be allowed to open unless they have the responsibility that would entitle them to public confidence. Many State banks may desire to become national banks. These should not be prejudiced by monopoly-created banks. The smaller banks of the country should not be compelled to go outside of their own markets to buy bonds, if bonds there may be secured.

To secure emergency currency we can not afford to create further monopoly in large cities. Let every municipality, if otherwise sound and all right, have the benefit of any law. Remote farming districts must be protected as much as the cities and populous districts.

Our Government can not afford to let any money be current that is not backed by the Government. If the currency is turned over to private concerns, let those concerns furnish the security of certain good value to reimburse the Government for its credit and let the credit be paid for in some substantial advantage to the people.

As to whether there should be authority to issue as much as 50 per cent of the national banks' capital in emergency currency, and as to whether the emergency currency should be confined to national banks, and as to whether the collateral should be 10 per cent in excess of the emergency currency, and as to whether the rates of interest should be those named in my comments, and as to whether any interest should be paid by banks on any reduction of reserve below the required amount are all questions that go to detail and not to the general plan. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will occupy some time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the distinguished leader of the majority on the floor of this House [Mr. PAYNE], in the course of a speech criticised a statement which I recently made regarding the effect of the paper and wood-pulp schedule of the Dingley tariff. He assured this House that my effort to demonstrate that the paper schedule had been used by the paper trust as a means of extorting millions of dollars of illegitimate profits from the newspapers had failed, and that all that I had succeeded in showing was the existence of a trust which had enabled the paper manufacturers to accomplish its end. Therefore to-day, Mr. Chairman, briefly, I propose to discuss the relations of trusts to the protective tariff, more particularly as exemplified by the schedules which shelter the paper trust and relate to paper and wood pulp. In doing this I express regret that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is not present to challenge my statements. As a substitute, however, I hope I may have the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who assisted the chairman of that committee when he made his speech by furnishing him with what purported to be estimates from the Census Bureau of the price of paper covering a period of years. I am prepared to show, Mr. Chairman, that those census statistics are absolutely false. The figures as given by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and furnished by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], were intended to prove that the price of paper in the United States was $2.50 a hundred before the passage of the Dingley bill and that the price of paper to-day is $2.50 a hundred, which is, I suppose, to maintain the assertion that the Dingley bill did not raise the price of paper.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Those figures, while they came from the Census Bureau, were not the Census Bureau figures. They were figures that were obtained by the Bureau from the leading authority, whatever that is, on the paper industry of the country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand; and what I propose to show is that those figures are absolutely false. If they are fair specimens of other figures which this Census Bureau is furnishing to the country, they indicate that Census Bureau statistics are unreliable. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it rarely happens that we possess conclusive proof of an assertion of this sort, but I believe that I possess it in official records.

I hold in my hand the second volume of tariff hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means held when the Dingley bill was framed, eleven years ago. Among other things, the undisputed testimony before that committee was that the price of print paper at that time was less than $2 a hundred pounds, and the only witness who named a specific price placed it at $1.75 a hundred pounds. That proof effectually disposes of the claim of the present chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that the price of paper before the passage of the Dingley bill was $2.50 a hundred. His own records here officially printed confound him. They prove that the price of paper was $1.75 per hundred pounds before the Dingley bill passed, and he admits that the present price is $2.50 a hundred pounds, thus proving my charge of the great increase.

But, Mr. Chairman, the distinguished Republican leader evidently feels uncomfortable over the charge that the Ways and Means Committee delivered the publishers of the country into the hands of the paper trust by fixing the tariff at 30 cents a hundred pounds in the Dingley bill. He seeks to excuse the committee. He stated in his argument to this House that so far as he could remember, when the Dingley bill was under consideration and the schedule relating to wood pulp and print paper was being considered, no newspaper representative appeared before that committee to protest against the increase in the tariff on paper and wood pulp. I was astounded at the boldness of the statement.

Mr. DALZELL. What was the increase of the tariff on paper and wood pulp?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I rejoice that the gentleman has asked the question. I am prepared to show that the increase in the tariff on paper was about $1 per ton, because the committee, at the instance of these gentlemen soon to form the paper trust, changed the tariff from an ad valorem tariff of 15 per cent to a specific duty of $6 per ton, thus covertly accomplishing the increase in the tariff by "a little joker."

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman say that the tariff as it is to-day existing exceeds 15 per cent?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; when it was adopted.

Mr. DALZELL. He is mistaken.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can prove that by the records.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, records are remarkable, but they are not proof.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are records of the Committee on Ways and Means, your own committee, printed officially. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in his recent speech, that no newspaper representative appeared at that time, let me read a paragraph from the hearings before his committee, then engaged in framing the Dingley bill. On page 1753, volume 2, the hearings on print paper begin, and the very first witness who appeared was a publisher of national reputation, Mr. John Norris. He was publisher at that time of the New York World and now is manager of the New York Times. He appeared before that committee and delivered this solemn warning:

> I do not appear before the committee to present any request, either for the newspaper or for the publishers generally, but I felt that it was due to this committee that some one should come here to advise it formally of the fact that the news paper manufacturers of the United States have perfected their arrangements for a combination by which every newspaper shall be at the mercy of a central selling agency and by which the price of news paper shall be raised, and by which these gentlemen shall derive an additional profit of from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 out of their investment, and thereby tax knowledge and diminish the educational possibilities of the newspaper press.

That was the statement of Mr. Norris December 31, 1896, when he appeared before the committee. He came not so much to plead the case of the newspapers as to warn this committee, a public body, that it was proposing in the Dingley bill to create a shelter for the formation of a trust which would rob the consumers of print paper in the United States.

For three or four pages Mr. Norris's statement continues. For three or four pages he is interrogated, and among the members of that committee who interrogated him at that time was the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], now chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who protests that he can not remember any publisher coming at that time to oppose the tariff on print paper. In the course of his remarks before that committee, Mr. Norris went so far as to name the men who were engaged at that time in plans to create the future paper trust of the United States. Those same men, ex-Congressman Russell, ex-Senator Warner Miller, and Mr. Hugh Chisholm, within six months after the adoption of the Dingley bill became the executive officers of this trust. Within six months after the Dingley bill passed the prediction of Mr. Norris came true and the trust was formed, controlling 80 per cent of the print paper manufacture of the United States.

But, Mr. Chairman, the warning given to the Ways and Means Committee was not all that he gave them. He also pointed out the method by which the committee could protect the country from the paper trust then being formed. On page 1755 of volume 2 of the hearings appear these questions by a member of the committee and replies by Mr. Norris:

> Mr. TAWNEY. Do you think taking off this duty would have any effect on the trust or combination controlling prices?
> Mr. NORRIS. It would simply make impossible any combination in so far as it attempted to raise the price of paper. It would be an automatic check upon any monopoly.
> Mr. TAWNEY. If we imported none in competition with that produced by a combination, how would it operate as a check?
> Mr. NORRIS. It would simply force them to keep their price down 15 per cent below the rate at which they could sustain a combination. The point on which this combination now builds is that it has obtained all the available water powers.
> Mr. TAWNEY. My point is, if we imported none to come into competition with that which is produced by the combination, or could import none, how would removing the duty affect the combination?
> Mr. NORRIS. To-day the duty is prohibitive. If you will allow me, I will continue the point I started out to make. It was this: This combination has obtained, or claims that it has obtained, all the available water sites for power. Paper can not be made by any other process except water power, which makes it sufficiently cheap to enable them to grind their pulp. They have also obtained control of all the spruce tracts, which makes the best pulp, and therefore they have the entire industry entirely at their control. However, in Canada there are exhaustless forests and water powers that would be sufficient to supply any amount up to an output of 2,000 tons per day. The mere fact that that is possible, with the duty off paper, would entirely check that combination. They are protected to an extent by distance. The fact of transportation would be a factor.
> Mr. TAWNEY. You maintain that paper would be imported into this country were it not for this duty?
> Mr. NORRIS. That it might, yes; and that if the duty were removed it would simply be an additional check against this tax on knowledge.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] expressed surprise when I told him the Committee on Ways and Means raised the tariff on print paper in the Dingley bill, and I have promised that I would prove to him from these records that the tariff was raised.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who was Warner Miller, a Republican or a Democrat?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He was a Republican, I think.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is certain that he was.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am glad to see the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE] has entered the Hall, and I want to call his attention to the fact, and I will read the language if he desires to hear it, that Mr. Norris, before that committee, testified that the price of print paper when the Dingley bill passed in the United States was less than 2 cents a pound; and naming a specific figure he said it was 1¾ cents a pound, or $1.75 per hundred pounds. Later, when Mr. Miller and Mr. Russell, large paper manufacturers, appeared before the committee to ask for a tariff on paper, they stated the same thing—that the price of print paper was less than 2 cents a pound. As a matter of fact, I can produce the evidence that New York papers at that time were paying, delivered in New York, $1.65 per hundred for paper, and away out in Omaha, including a high freight rate, I was not paying much, if anything, more than 2 cents a pound. Now, at 1¾ cents a pound a 15 per cent ad valorem tariff, as under the Wilson bill, is one thing, and a specific duty of $6 per ton, as provided in the Dingley bill, is an entirely different thing. An ad valorem tariff of 15 per cent on paper selling for $1.75 per hundred is almost exactly $5 per ton, and the duty which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and his committee put on at that time was $6 per ton, thus covertly consumating, without assuming to do so, and concealing the fact from the public, an increase of $1 per ton on print paper.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman to say that the price of paper was then 2 cents a pound.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, sir; you understood me to say, if you understood me right, that it was less than 2 cents a pound. The New York papers were paying $1.65 per hundred delivered. A 15 per cent tariff on that is less than $5 a ton, and your committee recommended and Congress enacted $6 a ton.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will take his pencil and figure 15 per cent on 2 cents a pound he will find that it is exactly three-tenths of a cent a pound, the duty that was imposed upon paper at 2 cents a pound.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but it included paper worth less than 2 cents a pound, and the testimony before your committee does not show that the price of paper was 2 cents a pound. Your testimony shows it was less than 2 cents a pound; in one case 1¾ cents a pound, which, taxed at 15 per cent, is about $5 a ton. All the testimony before your committee was to the effect that the price was less than 2 cents a pound.

Mr. DALZELL. Where?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was less at the mill, and it was even less delivered in New York after paying freight.

Mr. DALZELL. How about Omaha?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My recollection is that at that time I was only paying $2.10 a hundred delivered in Omaha after a heavy freight charge. The price at the mill was less than 2 cents.

Mr. DALZELL. The average market price of paper at that time, according to the testimony, was less than 2 cents per pound.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was less than 2 cents a pound.

Mr. DALZELL. At some places it was in excess of 2 cents, and a little less at others, but the average price was about 2 cents.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is now the assertion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but the testimony before the committee is that it was less than 2 cents a pound, and one of the manufacturers said that he was afraid to say in public how much less it was. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, the price of paper had been coming down for fifteen years.

Mr. BATES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. BATES. Has the gentleman any testimony that the average price was less than 2 cents a pound over the country, except the testimony he has referred to? He has referred to instances of the price of $1.65 and $1.75, but is there any testimony that the average price throughout the country was less than 2 cents?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The test price of paper is the price at the mill. The freights vary it, but the basic price is the price at the mill.

Mr. BATES. But it is the average price that governs the Committee on Ways and Means in making a tariff.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not if you add a lot of freight. The average price of paper, the universal testimony is, was less than 2 cents. Here is the testimony of Warner Miller, one of the organizers of the paper trust, who says, on page 1763 of the hearings:

> To-day we are selling a much better article of paper—I dare not say how cheap with Mr. Norris in the room—but less than 2 cents a pound.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What did Mr. Norris say?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He said the price was 1¾ cents a pound. But, Mr. Chairman, my desire is to prove that the present price of paper at 2½ cents a pound is more than 25 per cent higher than it was at the time the Dingley paper tariff was passed at the request and on the urgent demand of the very man who, six months later, organized the paper trust, and that the committee had a fair warning that the trust was being formed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Dingley bill was enacted in July, 1897. The International Paper Company was organized the following January. The three paper manufacturers who had appeared before the committee and secured the paper and pulp tariff became its executive officers, just as Mr. Norris had predicted. They were: Mr. Russell, president; Mr. Warner Miller, accountant, and Mr. Chisholm, who had presented a written argument, became vice-president.

The real object of the gentlemen who secured the Dingley tariff on paper, and who six months later formed the International Paper Company, was to capitalize the water powers and spruce forests of the United States, form a great monopoly, and raise the price of print paper in America. They started with a capitalization of $51,000,000 of stocks and bonds. Instead of putting in the mills at their real value, it was more than doubled. For instance, to build a paper mill costs $10,000 for every ton of daily capacity. This makes a mill with a capacity of 100 tons a day cost $1,000,000. Such mills, even when old, were accepted at more than double that amount. The capacity of all the mills in this trust did not exceed 1,500 tons per day, and even if new and modern were therefore not worth over $15,000,000. The rest of the $51,000,000 of capital was chiefly the capitalization of monopoly power derived by tariff protection.

Of the ninety-eight machines embraced in the mills of this trust only forty-three were of recent make; fifty-five were old, if not obsolete; yet they were capitalized at more than twice the cost of new plants, and upon this old junk an effort has been made to earn dividends on the enormously inflated valuations. At this time the International Paper Company has a capitalization of stocks and bonds approximately amounting to $60,000,000 and a surplus of $7,000,000, accumulated during its short history. Besides paying dividends on its preferred stock and interest on its bonds, it has sometimes paid dividends on its nearly $20,000,000 of common stock, all of which is water and represents no value whatever except the power to extort under the protection of the tariff. Millions of dollars of earnings of this company have been put into improvements and charged up to operating expenses so as to conceal the earning power of this tariff-protected monopoly and increase its assets. Starting with twenty-four mills, it has acquired others, and now has thirty, and with its allies it has a monopoly of the water powers and spruce lands of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the International Paper Company, while it was the greatest combination of paper makers organized under the shelter of this protective tariff, was not the only one. There soon grew up in the West a companion to it, a combination of the paper mills of Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota. That combination of mills, by agreement among themselves, stifled local competition. By an agreement with the International Paper Company they prevented each from going into the field of the other, and under the shelter of the protective tariff which the Dingley bill gave they escaped all competition from abroad.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman if print paper was not selling in this country last year, up to about the 1st of January, at less than 2 cents a pound?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; in some cases slightly less.

Mr. PAYNE. So it was as low as when the tariff was put on in 1897?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, sir; it was not. It has never been as low as it was before the Dingley bill was passed, and on that assertion I can cite figures which I have received, showing the actual prices in New York paid by two great papers in New York year by year.

In 1896, before the Dingley bill was passed, both of these papers were paying $1.65 per hundred for paper delivered in New York, even after the payment of the freight. Last year one of these papers was paying $2 a hundred and the other $2.50 a hundred, and I think if there had been any possibility of any paper getting low prices these New York papers would have been able to do so.

It is true there have been fluctuations in the price of paper since the Dingley bill passed. The trust has not always had the field entirely to itself. Now and then there has been some competition from smaller concerns. Sometimes it has fought these, more often it has bought them out or absorbed them. Six mills have been added to the original twenty-four. Temporarily this sporadic competition has reduced prices here and there. The Great Northern Paper Company bid fair at one time to be a real competitor, but terms have evidently been reached, the business divided, and prices agreed upon so that competition has ceased. The final proof of this came last year. During the latter half of the year conferences were held and prices steadily advanced, and finally, on September 5, in the city of New York, at a meeting held between the representatives of the International and all other companies, prices were finally fixed at $2.50 per hundred pounds delivered in New York for large consumers and $2.60 for smaller ones. That achieved an arbitrary advance of 25 per cent within one year.

Mr. PAYNE. I know that the small newspaper did pay less than 2 cents—about $1.90 a hundred—last year. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to another fact, that from 1897 to 1907 wages in the United States increased a good deal more than the price of paper has increased.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am glad the gentleman refers to wages, for that brings us to an interesting branch of this subject. These paper makers who induced the Committee on Ways and Means to increase the tariff under the Dingley bill made the statement that they did not do it to increase the profits, but as friends of the laboring men, so as to enable them to pay American wages and to compensate them for the difference between the cost of the wages in the United States and the wages abroad.

Well, Mr. Chairman, this is a familiar argument. We have heard it in every case, in every schedule, and it is the most hypocritical and utterly discredited argument of all. These paper makers demanded and secured the tariff of $6 per ton on print paper, when the figures show that the total labor cost in print paper is at the most only $7 per ton. Does that look as though they were intending merely to compensate themselves for the difference in the labor cost between our country and others? And it is a fact, Mr. Chairman, that in those hearings before that Committee on Ways and Means the uncontradicted statement was that paper was then being made as cheaply in the United States as anywhere else in the world. It was being cheaply made here because American ingenuity had increased the speed of the paper machines and had increased their width, which enormously increased the daily output. Besides this came the discovery or invention of wood pulp, and this greatly cut down the cost of paper, and in eight years reduced the price from 4 cents to less than 2 cents a pound in 1897. These paper makers came before the Committee on Ways and Means and induced that committee to raise the tariff. Mr. Norris, for the newspaper publishers, warned the committee that the paper makers contemplated forming a trust and raising the price of paper under shelter of the tariff to 2½ cents a pound, but he warned in vain.

But now as to the wages. Let us see what the statistics show. The last enormous advance in the price is $10 per ton. The entire cost of labor in a ton of paper is about $7. To make all the print paper in America the manufacturers only pay about a little over $4,000,000 a year in wages and the product even at $2 per hundred amounts to six times as much. So that labor is a small factor in the production of print paper, being less than one-sixth of the cost. As a matter of fact, the newspapers which are being plundered employ forty times as many wage-earners.

If we examine the last census report, we will not find very complete figures on the print-paper business, because the figures cover in one table all kinds of paper—book and print—and wood pulp as well. Nevertheless the figures are instructive and tell of trust methods and trust tendencies. Compare, for instance, the figures for 1890, which was before the great growth of trusts, with those of 1900, when they had increased enormously. Here are the census figures:

Paper and pulp manufacture.

	1890.	1900.
Capital	$89,829,000	$167,507,000
Salaries	$1,770,657	$1,500,000
Wage-earners	31,000	49,000
Wages paid	$13,204,000	$20,746,426
Product value	$78,937,000	$127,326,000

The effects of trust methods are seen in the enormous increase of capital, much of it largely fictitious; in the enormous increase of salaries, due to the princely salaries which trusts pay, and in the almost equally large increase in the value of the total products, due in part to increased prices. You will note that while the total salaries paid more than doubled, the amount of wages paid only increased about one-half. In 1890 wages represented 16 per cent of the value of the products, ten years later only 15 per cent. Does that look as though labor got its share? Moreover, the average wage of the 31,000 wage-earners in 1890 was $426 a year. In 1900 the average of the 49,000 wage-earners was $423 per year. Does that look like an increase in wages?

Now, I am aware that I am using the census figures of 1900, but they are the last that are authentic and available. I am also aware that I am taking figures which include all kinds of paper mills, not only print paper but book paper and wood pulp, but this is the way they are compiled by the Government. They certainly do not show that the Dingley tariff was of any benefit to the wage-earner in the paper mill. It simply enabled the mill owner to rob the publisher.

But, Mr. Chairman, while this paper schedule has created the paper trust, which personally I feel to some extent and of which I know a great deal, I am not here to say there is any greater urgency for the repeal of the tariff on print paper to check the rapacity of this trust than there is for the repeal of the tariff on lumber or any other article controlled by a trust.

In fact, the tariff on lumber produces some of the same evil effects that the tariff on print paper produces, because it offers a giant premium for the destruction of our forests. While every other nation in the world is now conserving its forests, we are, through the tariff, offering a premium to trusts to send wood choppers into them and ruthlessly destroy them.

Mr. GLASS. May I suggest to my colleague, before he gets further away from the question of wages, that the amount of wages paid out by all of the newspapers of the United States is forty times as much as the wages paid out by the paper manufacturers of the United States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My friend is entirely correct. The wages paid by newspapers of the United States, that have no protection, amount to much over a hundred million dollars a year. This exaction of a tariff-protected trust upon the newspapers simply forces them to do with fewer men, to reduce the size of their papers, to cut down their expenses in other directions, or to increase the selling price of their publications. There is no other alternative except bankruptcy.

Mr. GLASS. May I further suggest to my colleague, in response to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that he would find it very difficult to produce testimony here that any of the smaller newspapers of this country during the year 1907 obtained their paper supply at less than $2? I know that I am paying $2.35, and am threatened with an exaction of $2.75 for my supply next year. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want also to direct attention to another feature of the situation. As I stated before this House some days ago, there has been during the last twelve months an arbitrary increase in the price of print paper amounting to 25 per cent, not in one case, but in every case where the newspaper was not protected by a long-time contract. What has been the result of that increase?

I have shown you what has been the result as far as many newspapers are concerned. Hundreds have raised their subscription prices and thousands have been forced to cut down their force, to reduce the amount they pay out for wages and other expenses, and to impair the excellence of their papers. But there is yet another side of it. The consumption of print paper in the United States since last September has declined 25 per cent. This is largely due to the great increase in price. What has the paper trust done under these circumstances? Reduced the price of paper? No. I will tell you what it has done. It has shut down mills. The policy is illustrated by telegrams like this which have appeared in the daily press:

PAPER MILLS CLOSE DOWN.

LIVERMORE FALLS, ME., February 12, 1908.

Orders have been received from the New York office of the International Paper Company to shut down the Umbagog mills of the corporation here until further notice. Similar orders have been sent to other mills of the company in New England. The general policy of curtailment is due to the fact that for a time the production has been greater than the needs of the trade.

What a change! Six months ago the paper trust pretended the advance in price was needed because the demand was greater than the supply. Now it is shutting down mills and throwing men out of work because the supply exceeds the demand.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the consumption of paper has been destroyed by exorbitant prices, and now these pretended friends of the laboring man proceed to throw out of commission very many of their large mills, and throw a large number of their men into idleness. That is another feature of the trust programme—not to mitigate and reduce the price of paper when the pinch comes and consumption declines, but to throw out of work the men whose interests they have pretended to espouse when they asked the committee dominated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to put on this prohibitive tariff.

Let me in passing call the attention of the House to another act of the International Paper Company last year while it was trying to starve the American paper market while the prices were being raised. In order to help create the paper famine in the United States, it became necessary to take precautions to prevent desperate newspapers of our country from buying paper in Canada, duty and all. So this International Paper Company bought 17,000 tons of paper in Canada during the year and shipped it to Europe. President Burbank, of the International Paper Company, has admitted this in the New York Evening Post.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not standing here to plead as a newspaper publisher that this tariff above all other tariffs should be taken off. Publishers have no greater grievances or equities than other victims of other tariff-protected trusts. I believe it is just as important to put upon the free list every article that is controlled by a trust and consumed by the people as it is to put print paper upon the free list. I stand for free lumber. I believe that the tariff on steel, amounting to 30 or 40 per cent, should at least be very much reduced. The steel trust, like the paper trust, came before the Ways and Means Committee. They asked and they secured in the Dingley bill a great protective tariff. My impression is that it averages something like 33 per cent, and yet the figures in the United States statistical reports show that the total labor cost in the average steel product is less than 17 per cent. In other words, the steel trust has twice as much protective tariff as is required to pay the whole labor cost in the average steel product.

Mr. Chairman, I come from the West. We out there have largely subdued a wilderness. We have built railroads and bridges, we have built cities, we have built churches, homes, schools, and all the other features of civilized life, and yet in every effort that the West has made to develop itself it has been handicapped by the fact that the western producer has been compelled to pay exorbitant prices to the lumber trust for his lumber, exorbitant prices to the steel trust for his steel, and to all the other trusts excessive prices. In that way the cost of our railroads has been enormously increased and the cost of our freight and passenger service made burdensome. We, in the West, being the producers of much of the nation's wealth and most of its food, feel that we have been imposed on. We derive no benefit from a tariff made by and for the trusts. We, like the producing classes in other parts of the country, are bearing the burdens which have been placed upon the shoulders of the American people for the purpose of enriching a few great interests here in the East that have such ready access to the willing ears of the gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means in this and other Republican Congresses. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would not address the committee to-day if I did not feel some one from this side should reply to certain statements made to-day by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHANEY]. In substance, Mr. Chairman, he stated that the panic of 1893 was produced by the Democratic Administration which came into power March 4, 1893. Mr. Chairman, that is a chronic statement. As a matter of fact, the McKinley tariff was a deficit producer from the second or third month of its life, and from month to month, with few exceptions, down to its death, and I challenge the gentleman from Indiana, and I challenge any man on that side of the House, to successfully dispute the proposition. I have the figures right here, and I propose now to read just a few of these figures to show the gentleman that my statements are absolutely correct. The law took effect on the 28th of August——

Mr. POLLARD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will be quick.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to inquire from what the gentleman is reading?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. From the last Democratic campaign book, which I in part compiled, taking Republican figures out of Republican reports, and I have the reports at my desk if the gentleman wants me to read from them. If he does so, I will read from them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But these figures, sir, are official figures taken from duplicate copies of the monthly reports sent out by the Secretary of the Treasury, and these copies, my dear sir, are now on file in my office where I keep them to read to doubting Republicans who, even at this day, doubt the facts that the figures are as I state them, notwithstanding Republicans compiled them and the adding machine in the Committee on Appropriations summed them up for me, and after the officer in charge of that machine did that for me I employed four or five other experts to add up these figures, and they did so. The additions are correct, and the original figures are taken from these monthly reports.

The McKinley tariff took effect October 6, 1890. In October, 1890, the Treasury "receipts," in round number, were $40,000,000, "expenditures" $38,000,000. Now, the second month comes—November, 1890, receipts $28,000,000, expenditures $42,000,000. There is a deficit right there in the second month of the McKinley tariff. There was a deficit, Mr. Chairman, in February, 1891. The receipts were $29,000,000 and $31,000,000 expenditures. There is a deficit in March, 1891, receipts, $29,000,000 and expenditures $31,000,000. I am using round numbers.

There was a deficit in May, 1891. The receipts were $31,000,000 and expenditures $35,000,000. There was a deficit in July, 1891—34,000,000 of receipts and $39,000,000 of expenditures. In October there was a deficit—receipts $28,000,000, expenditures $31,000,000. In November, 1891, the receipts were $26,000,000 and the expenditures were $27,000,000—another deficit. In December, 1891, the receipts were $27,000,000 and expenditures $31,000,000—a chronic deficit producer was this Republican tariff. In January, 1892, the receipts were $30,000,000, the expenditures $35,000,000. In April, 1892, the receipts were $27,000,000 and the expenditures $31,000,000.

Mr. CHANEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment, and I will yield gladly.

In May, 1892, the receipts were $28,000,000 and the expenditures were $32,000,000, making in the twenty months of the McKinley tariff $603,674,423 receipts, while the expenditures were $612,697,000, making a deficit of $9,022,685.11, to be exact. Now, then, that occurred before Mr. Cleveland was even nominated and during twenty months of Harrison's Administration under the McKinley tariff.

Mr. CHANEY. The gentleman certainly does not think it was the Dingley tariff?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; the McKinley tariff. I submit the table from which I have read, as follows:

Operation of the Treasury Department under the McKinley tariff act of October 6, 1890, repealed by the Wilson tariff act of August 28, 1894, covering a period of forty-seven months.

BEFORE CLEVELAND'S NOMINATION.

Total	603,674,423.37	612,697,108.48

Deficit for twenty months, $9,022,685.11.

[a] McKinley Act took effect October 6, 1890.
[b] Deficit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I challenge any man on top of the earth to successfully dispute these figures. These deficits occurred before Cleveland was elected, beginning nineteen months before he was nominated, in June, 1892.

Mr. CHANEY. Was it not in anticipation of his election?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. These deficits began away back yonder, in November, 1890, the second month of the McKinley tariff, and Cleveland was not nominated until June, 1893. Now, then, "after Cleveland's nomination," in June, but before his election, there was a deficit, Mr. Chairman, July, 1892. The receipts were $34,000,000 and the expenditures $37,000,000. There was a deficit in October, 1892, $31,836,138 of receipts, and $31,881,250 of expenditures. There was a deficit the next month, November—receipts, $28,000,000; expenditures, $30,000,000. There was a deficit the next month, December—receipts, $33,000,000; expenditures, $34,000,000. There was a deficit the next month, January, 1893—receipts, $35,000,000; expenditures, $39,000,000. In February there was a deficit.

The total receipts for the nine months after Cleveland's nomination and before his inauguration, March 4, 1893, were $290,728,240.65, expenditures, $295,026,711.78, or a total deficit for the nine months of $4,298,471.13; to be exact. I submit this table from which I have read:

AFTER CLEVELAND'S NOMINATION.

Month.	Receipts.	Expenditures.
June, 1892[a]	$31,219,117.98	$28,940,634.25
July, 1892	34,571,356.25	[b]37,249,407.04
August, 1892	34,032,928.53	32,080,779.53
September, 1892	31,841,278.66	28,917,798.74

Total	290,728,240.65	295,023,711.78

Deficit for 9 months, $4,298,471.13.

[a] Cleveland nominated June 21, 1892.
[b] Deficit.
[c] Cleveland elected.

The McKinley tariff law was not repealed until August 28, 1894, when the Wilson tariff law took effect. The Sherman silver law was not repealed until the summer of 1893.

Cleveland is President on March 4, 1893. Let us see how this McKinley tariff continued to produce deficits—right along, chronic, you see.

April, 1893, the receipts were $28,000,000, expenditures $33,000,000. In July the receipts were $30,000,000 and the expenditures $39,000,000; in August, receipts $23,000,000 and $33,000,000 of expenditures; and then there was a deficit the next month, and the next month, the next month, the next month, the next month, the next month, the next month, and then skipped a month; a deficit the next month, August, 1894 (the last month of the McKinley Act), making almost an endless monthly deficit for forty-seven months. From March, 1893—with the McKinley tariff act still in full force—to August, 1894, eighteen months, the receipts were $1,388,287,167; expenditures, $1,468,302,165—a deficit of over $80,000,000; to be exact, $80,014,998.70.

[c] Wilson tariff took effect August 28, 1894.

These tables are based upon the "Comparative statement of expenditures and receipts of the United States," which (see appendices, Democratic campaign book, 1906, p. 252) is issued monthly by the Treasury Department and is printed in the RECORD of June 20, 1906, pages 9047 to 9051, in so far as they cover the operations of the Treasury under the McKinley tariff, from and including October, 1890, down to and including February, 1893—four days before the second inauguration of Mr. Cleveland.

In the face of these official figures, the Republicans charge:

That the first deficit under the McKinley tariff was November, 1892 (when, in fact, it first occurred November, 1890, as shown above); that this deficit and all others under the McKinley tariff were caused by the election of Mr. Cleveland and a Democratic Congress in November, 1892; and that their election caused the panic of 1893, when, in truth, the Treasury was virtually bankrupt long before the nomination, election, or inauguration, March, 1893, of Mr. Cleveland.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In extending my remarks I submit the reports of Secretaries Windom and Foster, which show we began to lose, by exportation, our gold in 1890—under Republican laws and Republican Administrations.

ANNUAL REPORT, 1890, BY WINDOM.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury (Windom), December 1, 1890, says:

"The loss of precious metal by net export during the year was: Gold, $4,253,057; silver, $8,545,455."

The Sherman and McKinley laws took effect in the summer of 1890.

LOST OUR GOLD UNDER THE M'KINLEY AND SHERMAN LAWS, MR. FOSTER'S ADMINISTRATION.

In his first annual report, dated December 7, 1891, Mr. Foster said:

"The loss of gold by net export during the fiscal year was $67,946,768.

"The loss of gold by exports was materially larger during the last fiscal year than in any recent years. The heavy movement commenced in February, 1891, and did not cease until the close of July. The total amount exported from the port of New York during this period was $70,223,494.31.

"It is gratifying to report that a return movement of gold is well under way, which has aggregated since the 1st of July, at the port of New York alone, $27,854,000.

"In the report of the Director of the Mint will be found an article treating in detail of the movement of gold of the United States, and pointing out some of the causes which are believed to have operated to produce the same."

On this subject, November 1, 1892, the Mint Director, Mr. Leech, in part, said:

REMARKABLE EXPORTS OF GOLD.

"In the summer of 1890, a movement of gold from this country occurred, which, while by no means as serious in amount as its predecessor, was somewhat remarkable as a monetary transaction, considering the low rate of sight sterling exchange which obtained during the period.

"This movement aggregated in less than two months the sum of $15,672,982."

SERIOUS TROUBLE.

"In February of the present year (1891) another movement of gold to Europe commenced, which did not cease until the close of July, * * * caused by far the most serious loss of gold which this country has sustained for many years. The total amount exported from the port of New York was $70,223,494.31.

"The heavy losses incurred by European capitalists in South American countries, the resulting financial disturbances and uneasiness, etc., not only greatly restricted this credit, but led to a continuous pressure, more or less strong, for gold to strengthen the reserves of the banks in England, France, and Germany.

"Russia, at the same time, withdrew from the depositories of Western Europe large quantities of gold, thus adding greatly to the drain and increasing the pressure for the import of gold from the United States, this country being the only outside port from which gold in large amounts could be readily drawn.

"It is a well-known fact that the Bank of England paid a premium for American gold coin, and increased that premium from time to time as the financial crisis grew more threatening."

BALANCE OF TRADE AGAINST US.

"The balance of trade, for these reasons, being against us, and the pressing need for gold in London, Paris, and Berlin, I count very largely for the heavy export of gold during these five months."

ANNUAL REPORT, DECEMBER, 1892.

In his report, issued February 5, 1892, Secretary Foster said:

"The net loss of gold by exports during the fiscal year was only $142,654, against a loss in the preceding fiscal year of $67,946,768."

MINT REPORT, 1892.

The mint director, Mr. Leech, in his report, November 1, 1892, after repeating the causes of our export loss of gold, recited in his report for 1891, as above given, gave two additional reasons for this gold movement, to wit:

(1) "The Austrian Government has been making strenuous exertions during the last year to obtain sufficient gold for a strong basis in establishing a gold standard for its currency."

ONE GREAT CAUSE.

(2) "One great cause of continued large shipment of gold is, as stated by all exchanges and financial writers, the distrust of the United States securities raised in the minds of European investors by the large and increasing preponderance of silver over gold in the reserve held for the redemption of our paper currency."

Thus we see Mr. Foster, in effect, condemned both the Sherman and the McKinley tariff laws, while Mr. Leech condemns the Sherman law as causing our troubles. Whether both or either law caused us to lose our gold, a deficit in the Treasury, or the panic of 1893, or all three, the fact remains that they were both Republican laws, operating under a Republican Administration, and the Democrats had voted against their enactment and afterwards denounced as a "cowardly makeshift," partially repealed, the Sherman law November 1, 1893, and later repealed the McKinley tariff.

MR. FOSTER OMITTED TO TELL.

Although Mr. Foster's testimony before the House committee, February 25, 1893, covers nearly nineteen pages, yet it fails to show that four days before—February 20—Mr. Foster had issued this bond-plate order, which reads as follows:

COPY OF FOSTER BOND-PLATE ORDER.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 25, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, requesting the original letter, or a certified copy thereof, written by Mr. Secretary Foster February 20, 1893, addressed to the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, authorizing the preparation of certain plates. In compliance with said request I submit below a correct copy of the letter in question, also a copy of the text of the proposed bond.

[Copy of letter.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1893.

SIR: You are hereby authorized and directed to prepare designs for the 3 per cent bonds provided in a Senate amendment to the sundry civil bill now pending. The denominations which should first receive attention are 100s and 1,000s of the coupon bonds, and 100s, 1,000s, and 10,000s of the registered bonds. This authority is given in advance of the enactment, in view of pressing contingencies, and you are directed to hasten the preparation of the designs and plates in every possible manner. I inclose a memorandum for your guidance in preparing the script for the body of the bond.

Respectfully, yours,

CHARLES FOSTER, Secretary.

THE CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

WASHINGTON, April 1, 1893.

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of section —— of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1893, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of April, A. D. 1898, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said March 3, 1893, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, payable semiannually on the 1st days of October and April in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form, by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Respectfully, yours, L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
House of Representatives.

The original order was on file December 25, 1897, in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Washington, D. C.

Senator Sherman introduced an amendment to an appropriation bill—sundry civil—in the Senate to enact a law permitting the issuance of these bonds. The order, dated February 20, 1893, itself in part reads:

"This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of section —— of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1893."

This shows this order, dated February 20, was given to issue bonds under a law yet unapproved to be "approved March 3, 1893." The Senate passed the Sherman amendment, but the House defeated it. The Democrats inheriting an empty Treasury, Mr. Carlisle issued bonds under the old law.

Recent letters on this subject from Mr. Carlisle and others read thus:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, May 29, 1906.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
30 Broad Street, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR SIR: The inclosed extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains a statement made by Gen. Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio, on the 26th instant.

If you feel inclined, I would be glad to know whether or not the references therein made to you are correct. You will recall that the order to the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was issued by Secretary Foster in February, 1893. Mr. Grosvenor undertakes to create the impression from this letter that this order to prepare the plates for the printing of the bonds was made not for the purpose of meeting a deficit in the public revenues which existed or would exist at the end of the Harrison Administration, but was made at your suggestion.

I write this letter after conferring with Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, as we do not want the statement of Mr. Grosvenor to go uncontradicted if it is not correct.

I would be glad to have authority to use any reply you may make to this letter,

Very truly, yours, C. L. BARTLETT.

CURTIS, MALLET-PREVOST & COLT,
ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS AT LAW,
30 BROAD STREET,
New York, June 5, 1906.

Hon. CHARLES BARTLETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On my return to this city I find your favor of May 29, with its inclosure. Two or three years ago I received a letter from the Hon. Judson Harmon upon the same subject, which I answered, stating, in substance, that I had no connection whatever with the arrangement said to have been made between my predecessor, Hon. Charles Foster, and certain New York banks, by which they were to advance to the Treasury Department the sum of $50,000, or any other amount, in gold or otherwise. I never heard of that arrangement until some months after I had become Secretary of the Treasury, and then my information was derived from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, to which an order had been sent by my predecessor for the printing of the contemplated bonds. I never had any conversation with Mr. Gorman or my predecessor upon that subject, but, according to my best recollection, I had interviews with both of them in relation to the amendment which Mr. Sherman had offered and which is referred to in the letter you inclose to me. I approved of that amendment. In view of the condition of the Treasury Department at that time, it was my opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury should be clothed with the power which the Sherman amendment conferred upon him, in order that, if it should become necessary to do so, he might procure gold by issuing and selling a 3 per cent bond instead of bonds bearing 4 per cent and 5 per cent, which were the only ones then authorized by law. In addition to the withdrawals of gold from the Treasury, which were then going on at a rapid rate, the monthly receipts had been for several months previous to that time, and were then, less than the monthly expenditures of the Government, as will be seen by an examination of the official records of the Department.

Yours, truly,

J. G. CARLISLE.

Mr. SMITH of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, before confining myself to the matters upon which I shall crave the attention of the committee during the time allotted to me, I desire to point out certain bills, germane to this subject, which have been introduced into this Congress by me. They are as follows:

A bill to prevent the use of the mails for the transmission of information obtained by fraud by detective agencies.

Also, a bill to prevent the imprisonment of persons arrested for contempt without a trial by jury.

Also, a bill to prevent the charge of conspiracy being made where two or more persons agree to do, or to procure to be done, any act in furtherance of a trade dispute between the employer and the employee in relation to interstate commerce, etc., if such act committed by a single person would not be criminal.

Also, a bill to limit the hours of employment of laborers and mechanics upon public works in the United States to eight hours a day.

Also, a bill to amend the Sherman antitrust law so as to relieve trade unions and agricultural associations or alliances from its provisions.

I also wish to mention the important fact that there is a wonderful activity on the other side of this House in behalf of labor and its claims biennially—just before the fall elections. All sorts of bills are introduced for labor and to ameliorate labor conditions, and now and then a timid labor speech is made here in the House and spread broadcast over the country, while the Committees on Labor and on the Judiciary are organized by the "Big Five," which includes "Uncle Joe," solidly against the possibility of any favorable labor legislation. I would not make this statement if it were not absolutely true. Time has proved it over and over and will prove it again when this Congress has adjourned.

I may further add that for the last ten days hearings against an eight-hour bill, which seeks to establish the eight-hour day in all works of a national character and done under contract with the Government, before a committee of which I am a member, have been practically the same hearings on the same subject had before this committee for more than ten years past, and it is perfectly apparent that they are being had and held from day to day, not for the purpose of obtaining new information, but for the purpose of killing time and ultimately to kill the bill.

The first matter on which I desire to speak briefly is germane, as I understand it, to the report of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which is now before this committee. It was prepared first in the form of an amendment to the criminal code, but it appears now that the criminal code will not likely be taken up again in the Committee of the Whole House, and hence I have introduced the amendment as a bill.

The purpose of the bill is to prohibit the transmission through the mails of information obtained from any company or voluntary association through some form of fraud.

It seeks to regulate the handling of postal matter, and the kind that ought to be handled by the Government, without the Government being open to the charge of aiding and abetting the consummation of plots and schemes only possible of execution by means of the mails. Is it not as immoral and subversive of social purity and good government to break down and crush trades unions and thereby injure tens of thousands of innocent men, women, and children, by the work of the iniquitous sleuth operating through the mails, as it is to promote a lottery scheme or some fraudulent stock enterprise or to advertise some unmentionable article calculated to corrupt and injure public morals in some way?

Sections 3893 and 3894 are leveled against fraud in its many diverse phases or against some form of immorality frequently exploited by the unprincipled charlatan to make money. The main purpose of my bill is to protect labor and trades unions in their lawful rights against the commercial sleuth, who has been described by a genius in description in these words:

> Who never did anything in his life but lie and cheat and scheme, for the life of a commercial detective is a living lie; that is his business; he lives one; from the time he gets up in the morning until he goes to bed he is deceiving people and trapping people and lying to people and imposing upon people—that is his trade.

Should my bill become a law, it would in a measure protect all voluntary associations from spies, imposters, and traitors. Such organizations are admitted to be lawful and have a right to exist and prosecute the object of their creation. On this point the President, in his first message to this Congress, says:

> Modern industrial conditions are such that combination is not only necessary but inevitable. It is so in the world of business, just as it is so in the world of labor, and it is as idle to desire to put an end to all corporations and to all big combinations of capital as it is to desire to put an end to combinations of labor. Corporation and labor union alike have come to stay. Each, if properly managed, is a source of good and not evil.

THE CRIMINAL USE OF THE DETECTIVE.

This particular phase of detective work was brought to my attention last summer while attending the trial of William D. Haywood at Boise, Idaho. For days I sat a spectator of one of the best-conducted courts that it has ever been my pleasure to witness. An ideal judge is Judge Fremont Wood, of Idaho—clear of head, honest of heart, and bold of purpose, yet simple as a child—a noble specimen of the true judge. He performed his duty seemingly impervious to "the slings and arrows" of a political press and an active, surging personal influence that beat upon him from every quarter. Unlike Pilate, he declared the law as he found it and let the mob cry, "Crucify, crucify." A stout, honest, noble purpose, backed up by the real man, compels silence in the storm, and the admiration of all, even persecutors. For days witness after witness, under oath, in the presence of this Daniel of the woolsack, testified to the plots and intrigues of the Pinkertons to hang Haywood. Our holy religion was prostituted by and for the benefit of this gang of freebooters of men's lives, honor, and the mine owners' gold. I doubt if there be another such case of real diabolism on record as the Pinkerton plot, hatched to galvanize and garnish into respectability the notorious criminal degenerate, Harry Orchard, so that his evidence would weigh sufficiently strong to hang Haywood. I saw and heard Orchard testify, and speak from what I saw and what I heard, and that he was, and is, what Clarence Darrow pictured him, there can be no doubt. He said:

Let us take a short view of this fellow. Who is he? And is he converted? We will find out whom we have got to deal with before we deal with him. I have sometimes thought I had a fair command of language, but it fails when I get to describing Harry Orchard, so I will just call him Orchard, and let it go at that. Who is this fellow upon whose testimony you gentlemen are asked to shift this crime to Haywood. Let us see: He is unique in history. If he is not the biggest murderer who ever lived, he is the biggest liar, at least, who ever lived, and I undertake to say that the record of the English and American courts can not show a single man who has been impeached by as many witnesses as Harry Orchard. Why, gentlemen, if Harry Orchard were George Washington, who had come into a court of justice with his great name behind him, and if he was impeached and contradicted by as many as Harry Orchard has been, George Washington would go out of it disgraced and counted the Ananias of the age. No man living could stand up against it excepting a phenomenal murderer like Orchard. If you had a lawsuit about a horse or a cow and you would go on the stand and thirty men would dispute you, what would you expect? Would you expect any jury to believe you? And yet when you take an infamous wretch like Orchard and contradict him by thirty or forty witnesses, a large number in every way disconnected with this case, lawyers tell you to believe him and take away a man's life on his testimony. All right, gentlemen, if you can afford to do it go ahead and do it.

Is there any man that can ever think of Harry Orchard—is there any sane man, I will say, who can ever think of Harry Orchard—except in loathing and disgust? You have seen him here. You have heard his story. You have seen him sleek and fat and well fed, facing this jury day by day asking for this man's blood. Do you ever want to see him again? Do you ever want to hear his name again? In the future, when you are trying to find the most infamous word that the English language has given us, can you think of anything but Orchard? Do you want to read a paper again with his name in it? And yet, gentlemen, upon the testimony of this brute—this man who would assassinate his own 9-year-old girl with a dagger a thousand times more malicious and deadly than one that kills—upon his testimony you are asked to get rid of Bill Haywood. For what? Does anybody else attack his name? Anybody else swear against him? Has any other voice been raised to accuse him? Oh, no. You are asked to take his life because down in Colorado and up in the Coeur d'Alenes he has been against the Mine Owners' Association, and because he has been organizing the weak, the poor, the toilers—has been welding together in one great brotherhood those men—has been calling them to fight under one banner for a common cause; and for that reason he has raised up against him the power of this body of men, and you are asked to kill Bill Haywood.

I sat beside Professor Muensterberg, the eminent Harvard psychologist, and saw him making his observations of the trial and of Orchard, and was yet a spectator, after he had made his tests of Orchard, and had given to the eastern press an interview in which he said that every word of Orchard's testimony and "confession" was true. This is the way he told it:

Orchard's confession is every word of it true. I went to Boise for the special purpose of studying Orchard and every facility for investigation was given me by both sides. I attended the court sessions day after day and heard the evidence. I also visited the penitentiary and made a psychological examination of Orchard, lasting eight hours. This examination included a number of psychological tests. I also went into the opinions and general make-up of the man. But it is impossible to sketch results in a popular way without giving the psychological data upon which my conclusions rest. It is my intention to prepare an account of my investigations for one of the psychological reviews—an account of interest to psychologists. My interest in the Haywood trial, I ought to explain, is partly due to the interest I take in the bearing of psychology on law, with especial reference to such questions as those of moral responsibility. I was very much impressed with the dignity that characterized the whole of the court proceedings. The attitude of the judge and the prosecuting officers—the entire court proceedings, in fact—impressed me the most favorably; and while I say that every word of Orchard's confession is true, I must say, from personal observation, that Haywood is having an absolutely fair trial.

EXPERT ANALYSIS OF ORCHARD'S CHARACTER.

Orchard is a remarkable criminal, mentally. He is the most extraordinary criminal I have ever examined, and I do not mean because of the record of assassination to which he confesses. He is complex. In one respect, he is very emotional and extremely sensitive to suggestions, while when approached from other directions there is an apparent absence of feeling of sentiment. He is a man of some confidence in himself, sometimes, and yet timid under other circumstances. Orchard has a very alert mind; he is singularly keen. My measurements, as well as my oral examination of him, show that his mind is not only active and accurate, but he has a very quick perception—he anticipates. In fact, for mental alertness few Harvard students would measure up to him. That feature of his case impressed me more than every other. I have been impressed by the fairness with which the trial is being conducted, and I have been agreeably surprised by the temper of the people there. No one I have met wishes a conviction unless the evidence warrants it, and the attorneys for the prosecution impress me as very earnest in their desire that the verdict shall be a just one.

Contrast this complacent opinion of the famous expert with the verdict of the jury. Let me retrospect a little. The twelve men who tried Haywood were selected from 265 citizens of Ada County, three of whom were labor sympathizers. The others were bankers, merchants, real estate men, office clerks, farmers, and a carpenter. Farmers, a carpenter, and real estate men constituted the jury which tried Haywood, all men of intelligence and good character; but there was not a real labor sympathizer among them. They heard the witnesses that had been gathered from all the Rocky Mountain and Pacific coast States by the Pinkertons. They went into the jury box naturally class biased. All that money could do, all the garbled, fragmentary, crooked evidence that black intrigue could rake and scrape together with money—and it cost the State of Idaho more than $100,000 to conduct this trial—could avail nothing, and with as good legal talent as could be found in all the West to manage this incoherent mass of material, the State failed, woefully failed, the alleged "red-handed murderer" was turned loose in a remarkably short time after the arguments were closed. In the name of common experience and justice, who was right? That jury, or Professor Muensterberg? The professor says the trial was fair.

It is not necessary to dwell at length upon the wickedness practiced in this case—the flagrant, wholesale scoundrelism of the Pinkerton chief and his tools—his gun men and treacherous minions who acted their part for money. The same corrupting influence which purchased Judas Iscariot; and Gehazi, the servant of Elisha, who lied to get money from Naaman, the leper, who had been cured by Elisha; and Achan, who stole the wedge of gold, the Babylonian garment, and other riches from the spoils of Jericho against the command of Joshua, was used in the attempt to barter away the life of Haywood. You will recall the punishment meted out to these miserable outcasts. But I would not, if I could, visit such punishments upon this band of freebooters, perjurers, and traitors, but I would discredit them in the eyes of the law and the world and drive them out of this kind of business, instead of making them the associates and handmaidens of the captains of American industrialism and the manipulators of the post-office establishment.

HISTORY OF DETECTIVE AGENCIES.

At first the service of the Pinkerton agency and similar agencies was such as would be called legitimate, for they devoted their efforts to running down violators of the criminal law who were hard to capture—forgers, assassins, ravishers, and other like atrocious criminals. This was their business for twenty years or more after the civil war, and they do some of that kind of work yet, but if they depended upon that class of work alone the number of operatives would be greatly decreased and you would hear not so much of the Pinkertons. In passing, let me remind you that my bill does not interfere with this character of work in the least. The man who follows the work of chasing criminals will necessarily grow cunning, and the lower qualities of his mind will be developed and he will soon become doubtful of all men's honesty. Like the libertine, who doubts every woman's virtue, his low calling fixes his opinion of female chastity. So the business of the detective, in time, leads him to believe that all men, in a greater or less degree, are criminals.

But the work of trailing and capturing criminals has come to be the smallest part of the work of Pinkerton's National Detective Agency. The agency represents, in its capacity as a legitimate secret service organization for the apprehension of criminals, the American Bankers' Association, the Jewelers' Protective Union, the Jewelers' Security Alliance, and the Railway Protective Bureau. This feature of the work of the Pinkertons is cleverly exploited in the news columns of the United States. The Pinkerton agency is supposed to exist and to make money upon the returns for this work. It is generally believed that the agency's great corps of operatives is supported, and its eighteen offices kept up in good style, on the money paid for the apprehension of real criminals. But it is a fact that, with only this income, the Pinkerton agency would soon have to go out of business, because the expenditures would be greater than the receipts. In support of this statement, I would like to quote from a booklet published by Morris Friedman, of New York, a former employee of the Pinkerton agency—a confidential secretary to James McParland—and Friedman's statements have never been denied in one particular. This is what he says:

The agency does very little criminal work outside of what operations it gets from the bankers, jewelers, and railway ticket bureau, and the bulk of this business is handled by the New York and Chicago offices. However, the institution has over eighteen branches and all these branch offices sail the sea of prosperity under the same flag as the New York and Chicago offices. It is therefore of interest to figure out, as nearly as possible, how much money a branch office makes from criminal work. The Denver agency is one of the most prosperous branches in the country, and we shall take that office as an example.

ANNUAL EXPENSE OF OFFICE AT DENVER.

The following financial tables, as applied to the Denver office, are approximately correct, and demonstrate the financial workings of the agency very clearly:

A week's expense in running the Denver office of Pinkerton's National Detective Agency:

Salary of manager western division	$45.00
Salary of superintendent	35.00
Salaries of four assistant superintendents	115.00
Salary of chief clerk	19.00
Salary of bookkeeper	18.00
Salary of cashier	18.00
Five stenographers, at average salary of $14 each	70.00

Salary of office boy	$5.00
Salary of private janitress	4.00
Office rent	35.00
Stationery	12.00
Interagency telegrams	5.00
Telephone	2.50
Postage	10.00
Thirty operatives, at average salary of $15 each	450.00
Total office and operating expense for one week	841.50

Total office and operating expense for one year, $43,758.00.

It often happens that three or four weeks pass by without Denver having even one criminal operation on hand; but, for argument's sake, we are willing to give the office credit for having as many as five criminal operations a week, every week in the year. The regular agency rate for the services of operatives is $8 per day per man and expenses; but large corporations and the societies previously mentioned get a special rate of $6 per day per operative and expenses. Therefore, five operatives at $6 per day yield an income of $210 per week, or $10,920 per year.

Total agency expense per year	$43,758
Total annual agency income from criminal work	10,920
Net annual loss to the Denver agency	32,838

It is plain that if the Denver office were to lose the large amount of $32,838 year after year, the agency could not hope to remain in business. It is also reasonable to assume that if the conditions which prevail at the Denver office hold good at all other offices, the Pinkerton institution would lose more than $500,000 every year. That the agency could not afford to lose millions in this manner is something everyone will perceive. That the agency is making instead of losing millions, the following financial tables conclusively prove:

Denver agency's annual income from criminal work:
Five operatives at $6 per day	$10,920
(This leaves twenty-five operatives unaccounted for. Of these twenty-five operatives at most seven only are working for the special rate of $6 per day.)
Annual income from seven operatives at special rate of $6 per day	15,288
Annual income from eighteen operatives at regular rate of $8 per day	52,416
Total annual income of Denver agency for thirty operatives	78,624
Total Denver agency annual income	78,624
Total Denver agency annual expense	43,758
Total Denver agency net annual profit	34,866
If the Denver office handled criminal detective operations exclusively, the net annual loss would be	32,838
Far from losing, the Denver office profits annually	34,866
Which is a clear difference of	67,704

The Denver office of the Pinkerton agency therefore has an income of $67,704 a year, absolutely independent of its income resulting from bona fide criminal operations. And can there be any questioning the source of this large income? As well question the existence of the sun at night because it is not visible as doubt that the Pinkerton agency is making millions at the expense of the public by fomenting and keeping up constant strife between organized wealth and organized labor.

These figures, which I assume to be approximately correct, show clearly that the office at Denver could not exist long if it devoted its efforts only to legitimate criminal operations, looking up testimony in criminal prosecutions and making arrests of criminals.

The loss on criminal work is about $10,000 annually, but this loss is overcome and many times covered by work done by the agency for the mining and other corporations, the profits amounting to $67,000 annually for one office. Think of such immense profits and the work to be done to get such profits, and paid for the single purpose of searching out the lodge business of labor organizations in Colorado and other States.

Do you think the Government should be a party to this nefarious kind of service, which capitalizes treachery and fraud in every conceivable form? If trade unions are entitled to exist at all, and if they have any good purpose to serve in helping to improve the conditions of labor and the social order generally, as I believe they do, why should they be subjected to such outrages? Have labor unions no right to protection against these hirelings of corporations, who are willing to sink the last vestige of principle and play the spy, and by feigning friendship for the miner (or the employee) and his cause obtain admission into the union, and by continued deception, cleverly practiced, become an officer of the union, the trusted agent of its business and secret work, only to betray and deliver it with alacrity to the hostile corporation, striving by "might and main," with the aid of the courts and troops, to disrupt its membership and hand it over body and soul to its natural economic enemy? Ispeak with respect to the selfish, materialistic, and laissez faire economist and of antiquated usefulness.

Pinkerton's National Detective Agency manufactures traitors and scoundrels by wholesale, and the Government, through the Post-Office establishment, is, in a measure, a particeps criminis. This I charge here on the floor of this House as being the solemn truth, and I want the American people to know it.

AN EXAMPLE OF THE SLICK OPERATIVE.

To make plain my contention I shall now offer some letters, and first call your attention to one written by A. H. Crane, a Pinkerton spy, which is as perfidious as the unregenerate heart well can make it. The language is smooth, as is usual in such cases, but the intent is thoroughly base, and I want to embalm Crane and his work for the benefit of those who approve of his kind and for those who wear soft raiment and devour the houses of widows and orphans and who live in fine houses and play the rôle of Pharisees. I also append Mr. Friedman's comment and explanation of the letter, which I consider of value, as well as his pen picture of the vice-president and general manager of the United States Reduction and Refining Company, which I hardly think is overdrawn, for Mr. MacNeill is a devout worshiper of Mammon and, therefore, has no need of a man except to sacrifice him on Mammon's altar. He would allow him a "full dinner pail" on the principle that a well-fed ox is stronger and more serviceable, a more certain yielder of big profits, the goal of all men of the MacNeill type. This and the same style of sycophantic letters which shall follow are given to this House and the public and will be printed in the RECORD to correct, if possible, as venal and low a business as was ever practiced in any country, and I include Russia of to-day. I had as leave follow the vocation of a procurer, who seeks out the foolish girl for sacrifice on the altar of lust. The man who will do the one will do the other, and the man or company who fosters such service by employing it must be classed in the same category.

DEAR SIR: Operative No. 5 reports:

COLORADO CITY, COLO.,
Wednesday, February 18, 1903.

At 9 a. m. Sanger came and called me out and said that he heard there was a carload of Italians going to be shipped here to-day, and asked me what I thought best for him to do, and I said I did not just know what would be best, but he could send a few men to see them when they got off the train. He then told me he had sent two men to each depot. He then left.

I went to see Moyer and Mangon, and there I met Mr. Burr, from Leadville, who has come down to take charge of the strike. We talked a few minutes. I left and went to get something to eat, and while in the restaurant two or three different union men came after me to make out applications for them.

At 10 a. m. I left the restaurant and went with Sanger to fix out the applications. Moyer told me the electricians and blacksmiths had quit, so it would make things a little more difficult for the Standard Mill to work. He said if we continued to keep on the way we were doing the Standard would have to go down. We then obligated four members, after which I left the room and went on the street and stood around with the men until about 11.30 a. m., when I went into the Alamo Club. I met Sanger and other union men, and they all seem to think that the men will win the strike.

About 12 o'clock I left the club and took a walk around the different places where the union pickets are stationed and found everything very quiet indeed, and returned to town about 12.45 p. m., when I went to dinner.

At 1.15 p. m. I saw Sanger. He said he had a bond for Charles Lewis, and wanted some one to sign it so as to get him out of jail; so we then hunted around and found J. Hill and Swartz, and they signed it by just writing their names on the back. When I gave it to the justice he said it was no good signed that way, which I knew, but said nothing to Sanger.

I then left the justice's office and had a little talk with Mr. Hawkins, then went to the D. & R. G. depot to see the union men who were watching the trains, but found none there, so stayed around a little while, when Richerson, Garrison, Howard, and two other union men came. I talked a few minutes to them, and about 3 p. m. left them and took car for Colorado City, where I met L. N. Edwards. He said he had some good news for us, and that Mr. Fullerton, of the Telluride mill, wanted to have a talk with Moyer and the other officers of the union and try and fix matters up. Edwards said Mr. Fullerton said he did not want to discharge any union men, and would not, as he thought it would be best if all the men belonged to the union, and he did not want any of the union men to think he was connected with Mr. Hawkins or any of those companies, and would not have a thing to do with them. Edwards then left me.

I met Sanger, who told me I had better take a trip around and see how the boys were getting along, which I did, with two other men from the Building Trades Council. We went to the big pump on Sixth street, and then across the company's ground past the old mill to the road which leads to the avenue. We saw no one on the way until we got to the M. T. Railway switch which leads to the sampler. There I talked with the company's watchmen. I said to them, "You are not doing much looking around when you let men walk across the company's ground, and strikers at that." They did not say much to me, so I went across the tracks to where the union men were sitting. I talked a few minutes with them, but learned nothing from them, and left them and went to town. There I met Dowse, Sanger, and several others. They asked me how things were, and I said all right. We then all went to the Alamo Club and had the treats together.

At 6 p. m. we all left for supper, after which, at 6.45 p. m., I met Garrison, Henderson, and several union men. We talked together until about 7.15 p. m., when I went to my room and got my books, and at 7.30 p. m. I went to the meeting. There was about 150 or 200 in attendance, with all the new members. Fifteen were taken in the first time, and thirty-one the next time, so it made quite a few new members.

After we got them fixed out all right, Mangon made a little talk to the boys and told them to work as they had the past two days, and then he did not think we would have to call out the Cripple Creek miners, but if we could not stop the Standard Mill, they surely would call out the miners. Mangon said he would leave us in the morning and would visit each union at the camp and tell them how we were fixed, but he did not need to tell them anything, as it was all left to the District No. 1. He then sat down.

Burr then made a little talk and asked the president to pick out a strike committee of five men. He picked out A. H. Crane, H. L. Sanger, Tom Daniels, C. Lyons, and J. H. Hill as the committee, and asked each and every member to do as the committee told them. Three men were picked out as captains to look after the different shifts of pickets.

The next thing taken up was about Mr. Western, the superintendent of the Tulluride Mill. The men want him removed from the works and are going to present a bill against him at the trades council after the 25th, so as to have the trouble come all together, as several men consider him unfair to organized labor.

About 11.45 p. m. we left the hall. I first took my books to my room, and then took a walk around, but found everything very quiet indeed, I then came back to the restaurant and had a little lunch, then went to my room, and at 2.30 a. m. discontinued for the night.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———.

Quoting from Mr. Friedman's comments:

The above report of Secret Operative A. H. Crane, more commonly known at the Pinkerton office as No. 5, like many other reports of a similar character, was sent to Mr. J. D. Hawkins, superintendent, and Mr. Charles M. MacNeill, vice-president and general manager of the United States Reduction and Refining Company, popularly believed to be a part of the smelter trust, and numbering among its valuable possessions of the great Standard Mill, the largest reduction plant in Colorado City. Four days previous to the date of No. 5's report, given above, Mill and Smelter Men's Union No. 125, of the Western Federation, declared a strike on the Standard Mill. The press reported the event as a passing occurrence, and the public scarcely paid any attention. Yet, as the inauguration of this strike was to a great extent the result of No. 5's work and had such far-reaching effects, a little inquiry into the causes will be interesting as well as instructive.

Charles M. MacNeill, vice-president and general manager of the United States Reduction and Refining Company, is primarily responsible for the occurrence of the trouble at Colorado City, consequently for the great Cripple Creek strike, and, to say the least, is a very peculiar and much-talked-of man. Worshiped by the rich as a demigod, execrated by labor as an archfiend. Who is right? What kind of a man is MacNeill?

Judging him by his actions, we should say that Mr. MacNeill must be a twin brother of Mr. Baer, of Pennsylvania. The attributes of the one are characteristic of the other. Mr. MacNeill is a typical American trust magnate and serves as a good example of what the American people may some day have to face, if men of this stamp are not checked in their mad career. He is naturally a strong-willed man and probably owes his success to this quality. But success turned his head and petrified his heart, so that in the course of time he has succeeded in imitating to perfection the brutality of a savage African slave driver.

FURTHER EXPOSURE, BY LETTERS, OF DETECTIVE OPERATIVES.

I want, as I have heretofore said, the country to know and understand the wicked and indefensible methods resorted to by so-called respectable industrialism in its conflicts with labor. Treachery and petty treason are resorted to as though it were honorable. This world has seen some very exquisite pieces of treachery, and I believe the following, exemplified by operative No. 43, of the Pinkerton agency, may be classed as one of the exquisite, if not the most exquisite. Union smelter men in Colorado were very suspicious of strangers, and this report of No. 43 shows to what some detectives will stoop. It is as follows:

DEAR SIR: Operative No. 43 reports:

COLORADO CITY, COLO., Thursday, April 9, 1903.

This morning I walked around town for a while and met a few of the mill men, but nothing of interest occurred. At 9.30 I helped a brother of the secretary of the union here, who has a van, move a lady to Colorado Springs. He questioned me all the while regarding myself and my business, but of course learned nothing.

After dinner I met Gilbert, Nichels, Burr, Elder, and Aberlene at the Hoffman bar, where we had some drinks. Some of the men got the drinks on credit from Hames, while others borrowed some cash of him.

There was considerable talk about the clubhouse to be built by the U. S. R. and R. Company, some claiming it would be a good thing, and others claiming it was done simply to get the good feeling of the people here.

I was with these men quite a while when Nichels and Elder left us and went to the pool hall, and I went to my room until supper time.

After supper I met a young man, tall, dark complexioned, who wears a stiff hat, and who told me he was one of the first three men discharged from the Standard Mill. I have not yet learned his name, but they call him John. We went to the pool hall and there met Gilbert, Elder, De Long, King, and Epperson. Epperson and De Long wanted me to play pool, and they took off their coats. I saw it was their scheme to get me to take off my coat, and I handed it to the young man, John, who went to the other end of the hall with the garment and went through the pockets. I played two games of pool, giving him plenty of time, knowing he would find nothing, and then the crowd broke up.

I took the car to Colorado Springs and received instructions to call on Mr. Hawkins. Upon my return to Colorado City I met John and Epperson, and talked a while with them, and when Epperson left John told me his people had gone away and he didn't have any place to sleep, so I invited him to come to my room.

At my room I showed him my books and the lessons I am taking through a correspondence school, and told him I had to get a lesson every night, and I made a pretense of studying it, and he looked through my trunk while I was writing.

After we got to bed he got confidential, and told me they had had lots of trouble with detectives; had had one named Cane, or something of that sort, and four others whom he did not know, and that the union kept two men themselves to watch the newcomers. We talked until 2.30, when we went to sleep. I know that I am watched, and must be cautious for some time to come.

FRIDAY, April 10, 1903.

This morning I took John to breakfast, and he then asked me to lend him $1.50. I pulled out about $3, which I showed him, telling him it was all I had, but he could have $1.50 if he would pay it back Saturday, as it was his pay day, and he promised to do so. I also told him I would have to get work next week. Then after leaving him I laid down and took a nap, as I wasn't feeling very well.

After dinner I was out for a while and met a few of the men, but nothing of interest occurred, and I discontinued early.

Yours, respectfully,

MEN ALWAYS UNDER SURVEILLANCE.

But the United States Reduction Company had another plant at Florence, Colo., and Manager MacNeill did not propose that such trouble as he had had at Colorado should get ahead of him in Florence. Here J. H. Cummins, No. 23, and afterwards Operative T. J. Conibear, No. 18, did some very excellent work for the mine owners. Here is a report from No. 23, which shows the surveillance under which the union men were constantly kept:

DEAR SIR: Operative No. 23 reports:

FLORENCE, COLO., Wednesday, February 25, 1903.

I went to the mill at 7.35 this morning and worked in the barrel room from 8 o'clock until 4 p. m., getting the lime ready for charging the barrels. During the afternoon Mr. MacDonald visited the barrel room, and while here told me to call at his residence this evening. While Mr. MacDonald was in the barrel room I was busy helping charge one of the barrels and took out a sample of the ore.

After Mr. MacDonald had left head barrel man Duckett told me that whenever Mr. MacDonald or any of the foremen were present the sample of ore must be taken out a little at a time from each hopper. The way the sample is usually taken is all at one time and from only one hopper. I then made the remark that when the foremen were present everything had to be done a certain way, and it didn't make much difference when the foremen were not present. Duckett said we had to be a little more particular when the manager or foremen were around. All of the men in the chlorinating department seemed to be doing a good shift's work.

I left the mill at 4.1 p. m. and went to town with John Edwards, Jim Edwards, and Horace Mann, and John Edwards told me he would have to think a long while before he went on a strike at the mill, as he was in the strike two years ago at the National Mill, and that all those who made the trouble and did the agitating were single men, who, when they lost their positions, could leave town and go elsewhere, leaving the married men and those who had homes to get along as best they could. He further said he believed there were a good many others who looked at the situation in the same way as he did, and that it would take some strong talk and urging a majority of the men at the Union plant to go out on a strike.

At 7.15 to-night I called on Mr. MacDonald at his residence, and he said he was anxious to know if anything was being done by the union men here toward giving assistance to the striking mill men, as he expected something would be done either to-day or to-morrow toward that end. I told him nothing had been done as yet, but I rather expected some one would soon be here to try and organize the men at the Union plant. He told me that in case a union was organized I should become a member, but not to take a very active part, as he expected to discharge the union men as soon as he got their names, and he did not want to draw the men's attention to me being a union man and still being kept at the mill. Mr. MacDonald then gave me his telephone number and post-office box number, and told me that if anything important transpired I should let him know by telephone or mail to his post-office box. I assured him I would let him know immediately if anything was done to get assistance of the men who were working at the mill.

After leaving Mr. MacDonald's residence I went to the National Saloon, where I met Barney Bramhall. I asked him if he had heard anything in reference to the strike, and he said he had not.

I visited the Palace, Opera House, Carroll's, and the Miners' Exchange saloons. At the latter place I met mill men Jones, Barker, and Fry, and I talked with them and asked them if they had heard anything new concerning the mill men's strike at Colorado City, and they replied in the negative. I stayed at the Opera House Saloon until 10.30 p. m., but learned nothing of importance. I then left the saloon and discontinued.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———.

NOTHING "BLOOD CURDLING" ABOUT THIS.

Over in the Cripple Creek district neither side to the controversy was overlooking anything. The mine owners employed several operatives of the Pinkerton Agency, and the Woods Investment Company was paying $8 a day for the services of a certain personage, Philander B. Bailey, known as No. 9. He was working as a real miner at the Wld Horse Mine, and this is what he has to say about a union miners' meeting:

DEAR SIR: Operative No. 9 reports:

VICTOR, COLO., Saturday, February 21, 1903.

I reported at the mine for work this morning, and at 7 a. m. we went below. I worked in the underhand stope on the eighth level. Francis Herman, James Wasley, and Tom Gaynor worked in this stope to-day. Herman spoke (as he always does) in harsh terms about the mine owners and superintendents. He also said there are a lot of s. o. b.'s in this camp who are ever ready to do the mine owners' bidding. To this Wasley said: "Why in hell don't the union drive these scabs out of the camp? If they (the so-called scabs) were in Butte City, Mont., they would have to hit the grit, and that quickly, too." Wasley came from Butte to this district.

We worked until 11 a. m., when we went to surface for lunch. Nothing of interest occurred during lunch time, and at 11.30 a. m., we went below to work again. We worked until 3.30 p. m., when we went to surface and home, arriving in Victor at 4 p. m.

After supper I went uptown and spent the evening about the resorts of the men until 7.30 p. m. During the evening I met Arthur Evans, Jack and Fred Minister, Chauncey Williams, and Harry McGuigan. Evans is working at the Portland, the Minister boys at the Deadwood, McGuigan at the Independence, and Williams at the Wild Horse. None of these men think the strike at Colorado City will extend to this district.

At 7.30 p. m. I went to the union meeting. The ballot was open to-day from 1 until 8 p. m. (at union hall) for the purpose of voting on the compulsory insurance now existing at the mines of the district, to determine whether the union submit to being compelled to pay the present rate of insurance, 3 per cent, or not. I heard several people say to-night that the Woods people are the only mine owners of the district who compel their employees to pay this insurance, and that at other mines it is optional with the men employed. This balloting will be continued next Saturday, February 28, 1903.

At 7.30 p. m. lodge opened in due form, with an attendance of about seventy-five members. There were three initiations. After nominating officers for the ensuing term the lodge proceeded to the regular dispatch of business.

There has been a standing committee for some time for the purpose of waiting on some of the mine superintendents in regard to working their men overtime. During the past week the committee waited upon the management (so they said) of the Gold Coin, Independence, and Portland mines. The committee reported that the management of these properties promised them that they would not have their men work overtime except when really necessary. The committee's report was received and the committee discharged.

After the regular business was disposed of Mr. Mangon and John C. Sullivan, president of the State Federation of Labor of Colorado, addressed the meeting. Mangon was in Colorado City in charge of the striking mill men, I believe, from Sunday last until Wednesday last, at which time he was relieved by a Leadville man named, I believe, Burr or Berg. I could not exactly understand the name, but think it is Burr. Mangon stated that since the men went on strike at the mill there has been something like 150 men who have joined the mill men's union at Colorado City. He said that he (Mangon) and Charles Moyer, president of the Western Federation, held a consultation with Mr. Fullerton, of the Telluride Mill, and that Fullerton made more concessions to them than they thought he would make. Fullerton told them (so Mangon said) that he will not discriminate against any man, let him be union or nonunion, and that he (Fullerton) will not pay his men less than $2 per day. Mangon said that MacNeill is a s. o. b., and that he (MacNeill) may wish before this trouble is settled that he had not started anything.

Mangon said that he talked with an engineer who switches the ore to the mill where the men are on strike, and the engineer told him that the railroad men are ready to quit pulling ore to this mill at any time that their union (the railroad men's union) says "stop."

Mangon said that the Federation will not call the miners of this district out except as a last resort, but if the trouble can not be adjusted in any other way, that the men of some of the mines here will be called upon to stop work. He named as the principal contributors of ore to the United States Mill, the Strong, Independence, and Hull City mines. He also said the coal miners are ready to make a stand for the mill men whenever they are called upon to do so.

Sullivan made quite a lengthy speech, but confined his talk mostly to bills which are now before the legislative body, the eight-hour bill being the principal one. He told the union that the only hope he has for the men at Colorado City to win out is for the smelter trusts and the Mine Owners' Association to hitch on the treatment and handling of ore. He (Sullivan) further said that if the miners of this district should be called out, that they will stand as a unit in behalf of the strikers at Colorado City. He said, too, that the present legislature will pass no law which will better the condition of the working people, and that all trusts and combines are against organized labor, and especially the Western Federation of Miners. At 11.20 p. m. lodge adjourned to meet next Saturday evening at 7.30 p. m.

Charley Stuart and I took a drink at the Monarch, and I discontinued.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———

NO INCRIMINATING EVIDENCE.

This report shows nothing to have occurred which required the presence of a detective in order that he might protect the world from some devilish plot. And this is what Morris Friedman, the former confidential secretary to James McParland, has to say about this feature:

As a matter of fact, if the files of the Pinkerton agency were examined to-day, not a report would be found showing a single item of actual incriminating evidence against the miners, unless it is a crime of itself for workingmen to come together and transact ordinary lodge business.

Let me quote further from Mr. Friedman's book, and let me add that what he has written and what I shall present to this House has never been denied, although it has been circulated from one end of this country to the other and was offered in evidence in the Haywood trial at Boise last summer, and has ever since gone unrefuted. Mr. Friedman says:

"After the State troops had been in Colorado City for about two weeks the governor, fearing they might die of ennui there, recalled them to Denver and appointed an advisory board to try and settle the trouble by arbitration.

"The board succeeded, after considerable work, in patching up a truce between the Federation and Manager MacNeill, and Mr. MacNeill was given until May 18, 1903, to carry out the articles of agreement. The terms of settlement were recognition of the union, an eight-hour day, a small increase in wages, and reinstatement of all old employees.

"When it became known that an agreement had been reached there was much rejoicing all over the State, and everybody prepared for an era of prosperity and happiness.

"But there were five elements which were a bar to the continuance of peace: Manager MacNeill, who had no idea of keeping faith with his men; the agency, which preached war to the knife against the Western Federation of Miners; Governor Peabody, who at best was a toy in the hands of corporation managers; the Cripple Creek Mine Owners' Association, which was leagued to crush the Federation of Miners, and Sherman Bell, adjutant-general of the State of Colorado.

"Manager MacNeill openly violated his agreement with the Western Federation of Miners from the very start. He compelled his men to work ten and twelve hours a day, refused to increase their wages, and only reinstated such of his former employees as were willing to quit the union.

"Mr. Moyer sent a committee to Mr. MacNeill to straighten matters out, but it met with signal failure, as Mr. MacNeill was absolutely immovable.

"We will for the present follow up the progress of the strike and the work of the agency in Denver. The work of No. 42, who is the central figure of this chapter, is the more interesting because, to a great extent, he was working under the personal direction of Manager James McParland.

"Shortly after the walk-out at the Globe and Grant smelters, General Manager Guiterman applied to the agency for a competent operative to fraternize with his striking employees, keep him informed and try to weaken the strike. The agency said it was a hard matter to place an operative in a locality where a strike was in progress. Yet they would endeavor to comply with his request. The agency chose for this work A. W. Gratias, known as No. 42.

"When detailing him on this operation, the agency did not think he would ever make good, and the only reason they sent No. 42 was that he had just got through with an operation for the Union Pacific Railroad, and no other operative was at liberty at the time.

"No. 42 was an exceptionally bright operative, and quickly adapted himself to the situation. And so shrewdly did he conduct himself, that in a few weeks he was invited to join the union, and a short time after was an influential member.

"The agency was now in a position to render Mr. Guiterman good service, and Mr. McParland himself drew up the instructions for No. 42. To begin with, the operative was instructed to create trouble between the leaders of the union. This he accomplished, and soon the union was divided into a number of hostile camps, the operative being strictly neutral, which so strengthened his position with the men that he was in a short time elected recording secretary.

"As secretary the operative knew in advance everything the union intended to do, and as quickly as he learned something he communicated it to the agency, and the latter to Mr. Guiterman. The operative was next instructed to agitate the question of strike benefits among the men, so that they would demand financial aid from the Western Federation of Miners, and he was also told to intrigue against some of the leaders, so that the union would expel them. The chiefs being out of the way, Mr. McParland hoped that the rank and file would call the strike off.

CAUSES DISSATISFACTION BY TRICKERY.

"The following report of No. 42 will show how he endeavored to carry out these instruuctions:"

DEAR SIR: Operative No. 42 reports:

DENVER, COLO., Tuesday, September 29, 1903.

I reported at the office and received instructions to speak to the members of the smeltermen's union in a careful way, and try to make them believe they are entitled to some money or some benefits from the Western Federation of Miners, to cause them to become dissatisfied, also to do what I can to get D. B. Smith out of the union.

I went to Globeville and visited nearly all of the saloons there. I found very little doing. I met Alden at Vogt's saloon. Alden told me he met a man yesterday who wanted to go to work in the Globe smelter. This party did not know Alden was a union man. Alden told him he was thinking of going to work himself. Alden said: "He told me to meet him this morning at 5.30 and we would go in together. The son of a gun did not show up this morning. If he had, I'd have fixed him so that he would be in the hospital now. I wanted to get him out alone, having had no chance at him yesterday."

At Predovich's place this evening I mixed with several of the boys. Frank McNamara was there. Policeman Malone spent an hour there, drinking and talking with the boys. Predovich called Malone out. They went out, talked for fifteen minutes, then came back. I do not know what they talked about.

I walked with Alden this evening. He told me that the Allen and Stewart combination, that are trying to get Smith out are also trying to get him, Alden, out. Alden said: "I have done more for this union than any other man in it, and now this is what I get. I led that attack on the smelter on July 3d. I made the watchman open the gate, and told him if he dared to blow that whistle I'd kill him. You bet he did not blow it. Mike Golden was with me. We went in the engine room, and it was Golden that pulled the whistle. Mike Golden is in California. They are looking for him, but he got away from them."

Alden is dissatisfied with the way things are run. He expected to get $2.50 a day, and as he is only getting $1.50 he is angry. He said: "If they try to run me out of this union, I'll make them feel sorry, if I have to kill a couple of them."

I discontinued at 9 p. m.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———.

"In the course of time the operative became so popular with the men that toward the end of the fall, 1903, he was appointed chairman of the relief committee.

"Mr. McParland now instructed the operative to make the bills for relief as large as possible, so as to drain the treasury of the Federation. The operative followed instructions so faithfully that the relief bills soon amounted to a little over a thousand dollars a week. He not only supplied the men with necessities, but even with luxuries and cash to spend.

"The operative's extreme liberality endeared him to the men, who rewarded him by electing him president of the union. We now see the unique spectacle of a Pinkerton spy, under the direct orders of Manager McParland, as president of a Western Federation of Miners' local union, and directing a bitter strike against the smelter trust.

"On his elevation to the presidency the operative did not relinquish his position on the relief committee, nor would the men have permitted him to do so, as they were perfectly satisfied with the way the operative squandered the money of the Federation.

"In this way the strike dragged on for months, with no prospect of a settlement.

ALMOST CAUGHT, BUT QUIETS SUSPICION.

"Along in May, 1904, some careless remarks of Mr. Dennis Sheedy, one of the directors of the smelting company, made the men believe that there was a spy in their midst, but the operative managed to lull these suspicions to sleep, and an investigation which was pending was dropped. The following report treats of this matter:

DEAR SIR: Operative No. 42 reports:

DENVER, COLO., Saturday, May 21, 1904.

I went to Globeville this morning and spent the day at various saloons, mingling with the union men.

I overheard three men talking of the murder of private detective Gregory. They expressed great satisfaction that he was killed, and said his slayers were good union men, and will get more before they finish. One of these men was Charles Nyburg. I did not know the names of the other two.

I met T. R. Stuart this afternoon. He is one of the prominent members of the union. He worked in the smelter as a carpenter. Of late he has not been so active in union matters. He told me he came to Globeville to see how the union men are getting along. Stuart is a great Democrat. He said, "Well, we won the election; now, do you think the company is going to do anything?" I said, "No, I do not. I feel sure they are not going to do anything this summer. It is doubtful, in my mind, whether they will ever do anything, but if they do, it will be many months hence." Stuart said, "Well, I guess we will have to wait until next fall, and then we are going to win, because the State is going Democratic by 20,000." I asked Stuart how the Globe smelter is running, and he said he did not know, but from what he heard they are having a hard time to get and keep experienced men.

I saw Amos Shreve this evening, and talked with him about the leak in the union. Shreve said he did not positively know whether there was a leak or not. He said, "The men that brought this thing up have only circumstantial evidence that some one is giving these things away. They have not said a thing that proved that we have a traitor in the union. Mr. Sheedy could very easily go to the First National Bank and there find out what our bills every week are." Shreve said he is beginning to believe it is all a mistake, and that there is no one in the union who is betraying them. We talked for some time and I agreed with Shreve that it probably is all a mistake.

I called on B. P. Smith this evening at his residence. He had company, and I only stayed a little while. Our conversation was general, and in the presence of others.

I discontinued at 10 p. m.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———.

"As the annual convention of the Western Federation was about to take place, the operative was instructed to become a delegate, if possible; and he was so well liked and trusted by the men that he was almost unanimously elected to represent Mill Men's Union No. 93.

REPORTED DAILY ABOUT CONVENTION.

"The convention took place in Denver, and the operative, therefore, communicated the proceedings daily to the agency, who sent them by special delivery to Manager Guiterman.

"Strange though it may seem, the convention did not authorize a single murder, nor did it order the destruction of any property. The following two reports are a fair sample of the proceedings and deliberations of the convention as seen by a wolf in sheep's clothing:

DEAR SIR: Operative No. 42 reports:

DENVER, COLO., Wednesday, June 1, 1904.

I went to the Western Federation of Miners' convention this morning. Discussion was resumed of increasing the per capita tax to make the $300,000 fund mentioned in my report a few days ago. They debated on this all forenoon, and on opening this afternoon the resolution was voted down. A majority of the delegates voted for the resolution, but it requires a two-thirds vote to change the constitution of the Federation, and as there was not two-thirds who voted for it, it was lost. There was nothing important brought out in the discussion on this resolution. Those in favor claimed it would meet with more favor among the members to have the extra per capita tax than to have so many assessments, as they now have. Those against claimed the members would complain against paying the increase, and a good many would probably leave the Federation when they learned the tax is raised.

This afternoon a resolution was introduced that a committee of three be sent to Cripple Creek to investigate the strike there and report to the convention how the situation stands at present, how the strike was conducted, and how it was declared in the first place, and whether it was in conformity with the constitution of the Western Federation of Miners or not. It was then moved that before this resolution be entertained that the convention hear from the different delegates from Cripple Creek. Sherman Parker was the first man called on, but as it was 5 p. m. the convention adjourned, and Parker will speak in the morning.

I went to Globeville and prepared the relief books for to-night's meeting, then went to the regular meeting of the Smelter Men's Union. There were 22 visiting delegates from the Western Federation of Miners' convention present and 37 of the local members. The relief bills paid amounted to $347.60.

The following delegates spoke: W. F. Davis, A. G. Paul, W. A. Morgan, and Sherman Parker, of Cripple Creek; I. H. Davis and Henry Gibson, from South Dakota; Garrison and Edwards, from Colorado City; Charles E. Maloney, C. P. Maloney, F. L. Rebar, W. T. Stoddard, and Malcolm Gillis, from Butte, Mont.; J. B. Fulber, of California; T. McGraff, of Wyoming; Stewart Forbes, of Telluride, and Lane, of Nevada.

The talk of these delegates took some time, though they all spoke on about the same lines—that is, they all flattered the Denver Smelter Men's Union on the record they have made in their strike. Some of the outside delegates said they were told that a less per cent of the men of the Denver Smelter Men's Union have gone back to work than has ever been heard of before in any strike that has been out as long as the smelter men have. Each delegate, before he finished his address, promised the smelter men that the fight of the smelter men in this strike was also their fight and the union he represents, and that they would stand by the Colorado mine, mill, and smelter men in this eight-hour struggle to the end. Some told the smelter men that whatever they do, don't give up the fight, and in the end they will win.

The delegates from Butte, Mont., who are representing the unions that have given the most money toward the support of the Colorado strikers, expressed very forcibly that they believed the strike here was just, that they were heart and soul with the strikers, and will continue to give them financial aid until the strike is won.

Malcolm Gillis, of Butte, Mont., made a good, strong speech, upheld President Moyer for the stand he has taken in the Colorado troubles, condemned Governor Peabody, although he, Gillis, is a Republican, and said, "Butte is with you to a man, and I want to say you are going to win. All I ask you to do is, stand together in the future as you have stood in the past."

Most of the outside delegates said they knew nothing of the strikes in Colorado, comparatively, until they arrived in Denver, but since attending the convention they have learned considerable.

The visiting delegates left at 11.30 p. m., and our union adjourned immediately after.

I discontinued at 12 midnight.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———.

DENVER, COLO., Thursday, June 2, 1904.

I went to the meeting of the Western Federation of Miners' convention to-day. The Cripple Creek strike was discussed this forenoon. Sherman Parker, of Cripple Creek, was the principal speaker of that district. He began by relating the condition in Colorado City in regard to the mill men there in the early part of 1903. He stated that the cause of the Colorado City strike was discrimination against the union men; that the Colorado City strike was the beginning of the present Cripple Creek strike. He said the Cripple Creek miners are not only fighting for eight hours for the mill men, but are fighting to maintain the present scale of wages. He explained that it was the intention of the mine owners to reduce the wages, and in order to do so they realized that they would first have to drive the Western Federation of Miners out of the district. In explaining the present strike conditions in the district, Parker said there were between 3,000 and 3,500 men that went on strike; that at present there are from 900 to 1,000 men and their families getting relief from the Western Federation of Miners. Eight hundred union men are working on fair properties, and 300 of the union men that went on strike have gone back to work and are scabbing now.

Parker explained the conditions the miners are in at the present time. Not being familiar with mining at all, and as I could not write down anything while in the convention hall, it is impossible for me to remember enough to report on this fully. However, Parker and the other Cripple Creek delegates that followed him explained to the convention that the mine owners are in a very bad way, and are almost whipped to a certainty. Parker and his colleagues all said in concluding their remarks that they are going to win out in Cripple Creek whether the Western Federation of Miners stands by them or not.

The delegates, especially those from Butte, were much interested and repeatedly interrupted the speakers by asking them questions when they did not thoroughly understand.

A committee of three were appointed to go to Cripple Creek and investigate into the situation there and report back to the convention. R. E. Allen, H. C. Seaman, and Malcolm Gillis composed the committee. They will leave on the 3.45 train this afternoon. Secretary Haywood asked that the executive board be given permission to select a member of the Cripple Creek delegation favorable to them to accompany this committee to Cripple Creek. The permission was given, and I learned later that Sherman Parker was selected.

A resolution was then introduced that a committee be sent to Telluride for the same purpose. It was then decided that they hear first from the Telluride delegates. They now adjourned for noon, and resumed at 2 p. m.

The principal speaker from Telluride was Stewart Forbes. He went into the details that led up to the Telluride strike. He explained how the union men were treated by the authorities. He also explained that it was the mill men there that caused the strike. He said that the mines there were not working successfully with the scabs they have at present. He stated that 75 per cent of the mill men have gone back and are scabbing. The Telluride delegates expressed themselves as the Cripple Creek delegates did, that they will win their strike, and if the Western Federation of Miners did not indorse it, they would fight it alone, and win it alone.

In the questioning following Forbes's remarks it was brought out that a Mr. Cameron, an agent of the Smuggler Union Mining Company, went to Michigan and hired men to work in that company's mines; that Mr. Cameron told the men he hired that his company had nothing against the unions; that the men could join the union if they wished, and that the only trouble they had there was with the Italians, and they will never hire another Italian. He told the men they would not be scabbing if they went to work for his company. A delegate from Michigan stated he met Mr. Cameron there; that Cameron took 27 men with him from Michigan to Colorado. Among the 27 men was a man named John Junkgrist. Another delegate stated he met Junkgrist in Denver yesterday. Junkgrist just arrived from Telluride and is going to Michigan after more men. The delegates of Michigan were instructed to notify their unions to look out for this man.

Another man said he saw a man that is hiring men for Telluride. This party claimed the only trouble in Telluride is with the Italians there. The delegate then said: "This goes on to show the mine owners must be in a bad way in Telluride."

A delegate (I don't know his name nor where he is from) asked Forbes if he knew a man in Telluride by the name of Pat Harrigan. Forbes said he did. The delegate then asked if Harrigan was a Pinkerton detective. Forbes said he did not know. The delegate then said he knew Harrigan before he went to Telluride. He was then suspected of being a Pinkerton man, and since then he, the delegate, has found out that Harrigan is a Pinkerton detective. Chairman Williams then informed the speaker that he was out of order, as this did not come up under the discussion of the Telluride strike situation. It was then decided that the Telluride matter be laid over until the committee from Cripple Creek return and make their report.

The committee on affiliation with the American Federation of Labor then reported. As it was now adjournment time, it was moved that the discussion on affiliation with the American Federation of Labor be taken up the first thing to-morrow. The convention then adjourned, at 5.30 p. m.

Joe Mehelict, of Globeville, told me to-day that quite a number of union men in Globeville have left to look for work. I asked how many, and he said he did not know; probably fifty or more.

I met Assistant Superintendent Cary this evening at 9 o'clock, and talked over my work with him, and received further instructions.

I discontinued at 10 p. m.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———.

TRIES DISSATISFACTION BY STARVATION PLAN.

"Shortly prior to the convention, Manager James McParland changed his instructions to the operative so far as the relief work was concerned.

"The operative had reported that Secretary-Treasurer William D. Haywood of the federation was objecting to the enormous weekly relief bills, and insisting that they be reduced. Manager McParland therefore instructed that the operative cut the relief down to an extent that would almost starve the strikers, and while doing this, to throw the blame on Secretary Haywood.

"Mr. McParland no doubt felt this to be a master stroke of cunning.

"Below we quote a report of No. 42 embodying these instructions from the agency, and a statement from the operative that he would carry them out."

DEAR SIR: Operative No. 42 reports:

DENVER, COLO., Thursday, June 9, 1904.

I reported in the office in the morning, then went to Globeville. I talked with a number of the union men and found them very quiet on the strike situation. The trouble in the Cripple Creek district is causing considerably comment. The militia and Citizens' Alliance were scared fiercely. Nick Kekick said the miners ought to all get together, arm themselves, and go to the Cripple Creek district and run the militia out.

I went to Joe Mehelict and told him the instructions received from Haywood Monday evening. I told him that last night at the meeting. I told Malich and Smith, and Smith thought we should wait until next Wednesday before reestablishing the pickets, also that in the meantime Smith wanted to see Haywood, as he thought it unwise to do anything in Globeville on account of the trouble in Cripple Creek.

Mehelict listened attentively, then said: "Smith is afraid of getting arrested. I am not. I know what Smith wants to see Haywood for. He wants to persuade Haywood not to send the pickets out. Smith is afraid of sending them out."

Mehelict was in favor of sending the pickets out and was very angry at B. P. Smith, thinking that Smith did not want to send the pickets out. Mehelict later said that if it had not been for B. P. Smith, this strike would have been settled long ago. He said after the strike had been declared, Smith told the men the strike would last some time, and told them not to wait around here, but get out and find work elsewhere. Mehelict said the result was all the good men left, and they had no one to do the picket work.

I met Steve Stucka this evening. He asked me if I thought the strike would be settled soon. I told him I heard nothing of a settlement or anything that would indicate a settlement; that the strike would last a long time yet, also that I believed the union will have to give up by next fall, if we did not win by that time.

Now, that the convention is over, I will again take personal charge of the relief work and will carry out the instructions I received from Mr. Cary about a week ago in regard to cutting down the relief as much as possible, so as to cause dissatisfaction, and get the men against the union.

I will put the blame for not giving the men more relief, as much as I can, on W. D. Haywood, by saying I am carrying out his instructions.

I discontinued at 9 p. m.

Yours respectfully, ——— ———.

"But Mr. McParland was mistaken. The men chose starvation and idleness rather than starvation wages for twelve hours' work at the fiery furnaces of the smelters.

"Month after month went by, and yet the men stayed out, until, wearied with the hopeless struggle, the union, after a two-year fight, called the strike off and permitted its members to resume work. This defeat of the union was due, not so much to the work of No. 42 as to the occurrences in the Cripple Creek district during the closing months of 1903 and the summer of 1904."

DISASTER TO THE COAL MINERS.

John Mitchell, the retiring president of the United Mine Workers of America, found out how two Pinkerton operatives, by posing as bona fide coal miners and using the United States mails as a secret means of communicating with the mine owners and the detective headquarters, could thwart every move of the United Mine Workers to organize the Southern Colorado coal mining district. President Mitchell lost the fight, and I would like to tell the story of how it was done. The Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, operating chiefly in Fremont and Las Animas counties in southern Colorado, had a system that discounted any one of the United States mints for turning out money. Once in a while a miner of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company got a wage as high as $2 a day. For this wage he received a piece of scrip that entitled him to $2 worth of stuff at one of the stores of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company. This system made it impossible for a miner to accumulate any money. The miners were unorganized, and so were helpless. The company realized why they were helpless and determined that they should remain so. The company first had deputy sheriffs appointed, whose duty it was to watch all newcomers and prevent any organization talk or agitation among the men. This method, however, was not calculated to keep out the secret propagandist, so the company asked the Denver Pinkerton agency for operatives who could do the business while working as practical coal miners. On this job were detailed J. Frank Strong, No. 28, whose vineyard was to be Fremont County. In Las Animas County Robert M. Smith, No. 38, undertook to keep the miners from organizing, and peculiarly, these two operatives were not known to each other. Strong was detailed to take care of and watch John L. Gehr, a member of the national executive board of the United Mine Workers of America. Smith's task caused him to establish intimate relations with William Howells, president, and John Simpson, secretary, of District No. 15, comprising the Colorado division of the United Mine Workers. These two operatives, Strong and Smith, by means of these methods, found out every move of the United Mine Workers' officials and reported promptly to the company and to the headquarters in Denver. Once when Gehr was going to Trinidad to direct an organizing campaign, Operative Smith learned of it and met Gehr, whom he knew well. Operative Strong also knew of the contemplated mission and was on hand in Trinidad, too. There he had the pleasure of meeting his copartner in detective work, Gehr introducing the one to the other, ignorant of the fact that he was in the presence of his two worst enemies. This letter will furnish a description of the meeting of these two men. The report is by Smith, and here it is:

DEAR SIR: Operative No. 38 reports:

TRINIDAD, COLO., Wednesday, February 25, 1903.

After having breakfast, Curtis and I started out to hunt John Gehr at the Trinidad Hotel, where he stays. We learned that he had not gotten up yet this morning. We then sat around the barroom a while, when, as he had not shown up yet, we went up to his room and found him awake but still in bed. He, however, invited us in and was both surprised and glad to see us. Then, after exchanging greetings, he got up and dressed, and invited us to accompany him to another room where, he said, he wanted to introduce us to a friend. He introduced us to a Mr. J. Frank Strong, who comes from Fremont County, and from Gehr's home local, and was a candidate for district secretary against Simpson last fall. Gehr introduced Strong as his best friend. We talked until Strong was dressed, when we went down into the barroom, where we had drinks, after which Gehr and Strong went to breakfast. Curtis and I went up to the county jail to see Jim Ritchie, promising to meet Gehr and Strong again on our return from the jail. After visiting Ritchie, we returned down town, and at the Horse Shoe Club we met Gehr, Strong, Frank Hefferle, and several other men from Majestic. We learned that they were to attend a trial. It appears, that a fellow who is cooking at the boarding house at Majestic got a valentine recently that did not suit him, and he blamed Hefferle for sending it, and told Hefferle that if he did not get out of camp immediately he would kill him. Hefferle had him arrested and the trial was to take place to-day, and they had sought Gehr's counsel. He was trying to settle it out of court, which, I believe, he finally did with the assistance of Curtis. At the first opportunity I began to sound Gehr with regard to these two organizers mentioned in a letter to me; but if they are here he would not let anything out to indicate that he knew anything about it. I did not, however, ask him outright if they were here, but if they are here he could gain nothing by not telling me so, so I will surely find them out. Generally, Gehr is as open as a book on such matters with me, which leads me to believe that if these organizers have been ordered here they have not yet arrived, or at least have not made their presence known to Gehr. However, he did tell me that he had been informed that James Kennedy had got a commission, and was going to assume his duties on the 1st of March. I can now see that there is going to be a clash of authority when Howells returns here, as he and Gehr have exactly opposite views on the system of organization. Gehr is bitterly opposed to the group system, and Howells thinks it is the only way to organize District No. 15. Gehr said that when he came down here he had not intended to remain here, but had simply intended to see how things were going, and then return North and go into Wyoming, but he had found the Trinidad local in such a dilapidated condition that he had decided to remain here and try to put it on its feet again. He then went on to criticise old Bill Howells for letting the local go to pieces after he (Gehr) had laid the foundation for the best local in the district. I then asked him if the national officers had promised anything for District No. 15 while he was back there in attendance at the convention. He said they had not promised him very much, but he felt that whenever we could convince John Mitchell that we had restored harmony in District No. 15, and were all working together, we could safely expect something from the national. We then all went to dinner and I saw no more of Gehr until after supper, and then the talk was almost entirely on Jim Ritchie's case, and the one between Hefferle and the other fellow. At 10.30 p. m. I left Gehr and went to my room and retired for the night.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———.

In some unaccountable way the miners succeeded in organizing a half-hearted union known as District No. 15. This district held a convention in Pueblo in September, 1903. Robert M. Smith, operative No. 38, sat in that convention as a delegate from the southern local. Every day he made a report of the proceedings to the mine owners and to the Denver agency.

Here are the reports, and they show that the coal miners realized that some greater activity must be indulged in, else their organization could not much longer exist:

DEAR SIR: Operative No. 38 reports:

PUEBLO, COLO.,
Thursday, September 24, 1903.

The first thing that took place this morning was a lengthy discussion as to whether the press reporters should be allowed in the convention. Howells contended that the more publicity we gave our deliberations the better, as it was the public mind we wanted to reach, and it was finally decided to let the reporters remain as long as they reported truthfully the actions of the convention, but that on the first false report going out the reporter giving it and the paper he was working for would be excluded from the convention. The president's report was then read, and dwelt principally upon the efforts that had been put forth within the last year toward the organization of District No. 15, and the almost utter failure of the efforts. It also dwelt at some length on the efforts of himself and others to get a meeting with the operators of District No. 15, to adjust an equitable wage scale, and its failure also, and he offered some recommendations as to his views with relation to precipitating a strike in District No. 15, which all present seemed to fully concur in. The sentiments of all delegates present, except John Gehr and Jim Ritchie, are enthusiastically in favor of a strike, and they are anxious to see it declared as soon as we get a substantial promise from the national that we will be supported. Jim Ritchie offered a resolution to the convention commending the striking miners at Cripple Creek and roundly condemning the governor and Sherman Bell. The resolution was referred to the resolutions committee. There was then a committee chosen consisting of Smith of Erie, Colo.; P. P. Mort, of Colorado Springs; J. L. Campbell, of Fremont County; James Kennedy, national organizer, and William Price, of Palisades, to draw up a wage scale to present to the operators for adoption, and if they refused to consider it, it would be placed before the national executive board for their approval; and if they approved it, a strike would be called immediately after the national executive board meeting, October 5. There was a telegram from an operator at Port Smith, Ark., to the effect that 500 union coal miners could get work at once in that vicinity. The dispatch was heartily applauded. The convention then adjourned at 5.30 p. m. until 9 a. m. to-morrow, and after supper myself, Jim Kennedy, William Price, State Labor Commissioner Montgomery, Mr. Hamilton, organizer for the American Federation of Labor, and several other delegates started out to take in the town. Montgomery told me he was here as a personal representative of Governor Peabody, and he could say that we miners had the sympathy of the governor, and that we had his (Montgomery's) full sympathy, and he would use his full influence to keep the governor on our side, and he considered his influence with the governor pretty strong. Hamilton substantiated his statements, and said he believed the coal miners were fully justified in their demands, and the governor thought so too; but, of course, the delegates are a little skeptical in accepting such statements in view of the prevailing conditions at Cripple Creek, and also the fact that Montgomery was somewhat intoxicated when he made the statements. He said he was going to address the convention while here, defining his position, also that of the governor, toward the coal miners of Colorado. We were out until after midnight when we retired for the night.

FRIDAY, September 25, 1903.

This morning the scale committee offered the following scale for consideration and ratification of the convention:

Demand No. 1, an eight-hour day; No. 2, semimonthly pay day; No. 3, abolition of the scrip system; No. 4, better ventilation in mines; No. 5, 20 per cent advance on all contract mining; No. 6, that all company or day men receive the same pay for eight hours as is paid now for ten hours. This caused a lengthy discussion, F. P. Mott, delegate from the Springs, taking the stand that the various unions in El Paso County had already presented their yearly agreement to the operators of that place for their ratification, and that they had until October 1 to sign up, and that this scale would abrogate the El Paso miners' contract and would place them in the position of repudiating their own contract, but he was finally convinced that the fifteenth district was larger than El Paso County, and that legislation at a district convention took priority over any local or subdistrict contracts or legislation. Then John Gehr took a stand in opposition to the scale, saying the operators would never agree to it, as it was asking entirely too much, and would surely cause a strike if we tried to enforce it. He was opposed by all the delegates, except Jim Ritchie, with the argument that it was not too much to ask, and they did not care if it did cause a strike, as they practically had the assurance that the national board would indorse it and support them in case of a strike. Gehr then said he, as national board member and the proper one to place said demand before the national board, would not carry such a demand before said board, as he did not consider it a fair demand or entitled to the consideration of the national board, and did not think we stood 1 chance in 100 in enforcing such a demand, even by striking, and he did not favor a strike anyway until we were more thoroughly organized. The fact was pointed out to him by Kennedy and others that we could not continue the organization under the tyrannical methods employed by the operators at all the camps in the South, and that he was a servant of District No. 15, and would have to carry out the demands of District No. 15 or cease to work for District No. 15, but if he would not carry the demands of District No. 15 before the national that Con Kelleher would. Kelleher had already signified his willingness to do so. Gehr was drunk all through the sessions of the convention, and he left the convention in a rage, and the demands were fully ratified and ordered printed and a copy ordered sent to each of the coal companies operating in District No. 15. This took up the time until noon and was not finished until some time in the afternoon. Then Con Kelleher gave the convention an address, reiterating the statements made to me several days ago, and which I reported at the time, that John Mitchell had instructed him to make the fact that he had met and conferred with John Mitchell as public as possible, and that Mitchell was going to convene the national executive board October 5 for no other purpose than to consider the grievances of District No. 15, and he had instructed him (Kelleher) to return to District No. 15 and have the convention draw up a scale and come to the national executive board meeting and lay the scale of District No. 15 before that body, and John Mitchell had as good as told him he thought the fight of District No. 15 would be taken up by the national. He also said he had talked with a number of the operators of Missouri while there, and all of them begged him to send all the men to them he could in case Colorado came on strike. This news was received with applause. This and minor matters consumed the balance of the day, and at 5.30 the convention adjourned until 9 o'clock to-morrow. After supper I undertook to write up my report, but was interrupted several times, and when I finished yesterday's report I gave it up and went out with a number of the delegates and took in the town until about midnight, when we returned to the hotel, and I soon retired for the night. The sentiment of all the delegates with whom I discussed the subject was that there never was a more opportune time than now to make such a demand as we were now making, and they all thought that with the support of the national we ought to win in a great measure, at least.

SATURDAY, September 26, 1903.

This morning there was a resolution introduced condemning John L. Gehr for an article which appeared in the Pueblo Chieftain this morning, which is attached. This caused quite a wordy battle in the convention, as in the original resolution there was a paragraph to the effect that Gehr was continually intoxicated. Moran, Ritchie, and Tom Hurley said that while that was the truth, it was putting it too strong to the public, and Jim Kennedy, Julian Gradel, and a number of others said it was not strong enough, as he deserved greater censure for what he had done. The resolution finally passed with the clause pertaining to his intoxication stricken out. Gehr was not present, having gone home last night. This was one of the reasons given by Jim Ritchie for fighting the resolution. There were several resolutions of minor importance, also several minor amendments to the constitution submitted and passed, which took up the time until the noon adjournment, and the first thing after reconvening in the afternoon, Charles Moyer, president of the Western Federation of Miners, was introduced and spoke at some length on trades unionism, socialism, and the Cripple Creek strike and militarism, and in conclusion said he believed the Western Federation of Miners would eventually win their strike, and he hoped the United Mine Workers of America would immediately demand the eight-hour day, which, he believed, would strengthen the position of the Western Federation of Miners; and he hoped the United Mine Workers of America would succeed in forcing the autocratic operators to comply with their demands, and that they had the sympathy of the Western Federation of Miners and any financial aid that the Western Federation of Miners could give them. John C. Sullivan, president of the State Federation of Labor, was then introduced and talked at some length on the failure of the fourteenth general assembly to pass the eight-hour bill and said he believed that the only eight-hour bill which would stand was the eight-hour bill passed by organized labor—by refusing to work longer. He also went over the Cripple Creek situation and predicted the ultimate success of the strikers, and said he hoped the United Mine Workers of America would get some concessions from the operators, but he was afraid it would take a strike to bring these same operators to their senses, and that the United Mine Workers of America had the entire sympathy and moral support and whatever financial aid the State Federation could give. At the conclusion of Sullivan's remarks a resolution was introduced declaring for a free interchange of transfer cards with all legal unions, which, after some discussion, passed.

The resolution condemning the governor was then taken up and unanimously passed. Then the grievance of the locked-out men at Rugby was taken up, and, after some discussion, there was a resolution passed that the district give Rugby $100 now and that each delegate on his return home request his union to donate $5 and as much more as they can spare to reimburse the district treasury, and that if more than $100 comes in from this call the excess is to be given to the Rugby union. The canvassing board then declared the following officers elected for the ensuing year: National executive board member, James Kennedy; district president, William Howells; district vice-president, James Graham; district secretary-treasurer, John Simpson; district executive board member for subdistrict No. 1, Charles Billington, Louisville, Colo.; subdistrict No. 3 I did not get; subdistrict No. 4, Robert Beveridge, Aguilar, Colo.; subdistrict No. 6, Frank Hefferley, of Blossburg, and Mr. Harlem were nominated and referred to a referendum vote of the subdistrict for a choice, this being a newly created subdistrict taken from subdistrict No. 4. After deciding by vote to hold the next annual convention in Pueblo the third Monday in September, 1904, and having a few short talks from the newly elected officers, the convention adjourned sine die, and after supper the entire crowd of delegates took in the town together until about 10 p. m., when they began leaving for their respective homes, and at 1.30 a. m. I took the train home, where I arrived at about 6 a. m.

Yours, respectfully, ——— ———.

MITCHELL ACCEPTS CHALLENGE.

The miners having concluded, as these reports show, that a solid stand for their demands was all that could save their organization, it was decided that they should call upon John Mitchell, president of the United Mine Workers of America, so they implored him to come to their assistance. President Mitchell listened to their plea, and telegraphed the officials of the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, asking for a conference in order that they might take some steps toward adjusting the differences between the miners and the mine owners. The following telegram was sent by an official of the company to Mr. Mitchell:

DENVER, October 7, 1903.

JOHN MITCHELL, Indianapolis, Ind.:

Answering your telegram of yesterday, in Mr. Hearn's absence I have to say that we have not been advised and do not believe that our miners have any desire to strike, as we have always been able to adjust directly with them any differences that exist.

We do not think your organization is authorized to represent our miners, as very few of them belong to it. If you understand the situation as it really is, you no doubt regard the inciting of any further industrial disturbances in Colorado as ill-advised and criminal.

J. F. WELBORN.

It is not necessary to go into a further history of this contest. Mr. Mitchell accepted the challenge and called the strike. Union organizers were spotted by Operative Smith and roundly beaten up at night. The coal miners appealed to Governor Peabody, and got his usual dose. Finally the governor declared Las Animas County in a state of rebellion and sent down the troops, and the usual violence followed. At last Mitchell called off the strike, and when the militia had secured a complete victory the coal miners' union had ceased to exist.

President Mitchell then decided to try to organize the district through secret means. In casting about for a likely man, he found Pinkerton Operative Robert M. Smith, chief cause of all the previous trouble, but as yet not revealed in his true character, and so he appointed Smith as district organizer, with the result that the whole movement was paralyzed. That is the story of one Pinkerton operative's work. Here follows some letters of the same kind, taken from the Miners' Magazine published at Denver, Colo. These letters are of recent date.

WORKING AT SAME OLD TRADE.

George W. Riddell, known as operative No. 36, and one of the slickest gentlemen ever sent into the West by the Pinkerton agency, was operating in Eureka, Utah, during January and February of last year, and I am going to quote some of his letters to show that he was at the same old game. Riddell was the man picked by McParland to ferret out the "inner circle" in the Western Federation of Miners. Riddell did not ferret out anything, and he said so on the stand in the Haywood trial, but that did not keep him from continuing to use the United States mails to transmit intelligence fraudulently received. Here are five of his reports from Eureka, Utah:

DEAR SIR: No. 36 reports:

EUREKA, Sunday, January 20, 1907.

To-day I was around the streets and saloons all day. Vance went to Payson to-day and no one was at the union office.

To-day was change day at the mines and the first nice day we have had this year. All the miners were around the streets and the saloons and I talked with a good many of them about their work, the condition of the mine, their bosses, etc. Only one of them, "Mickey" Sullivan, an employee of the "Blue Rock," had anything of interest to say. He told me everything at the mine was running smoothly; that Wes. Martin was doing more union agitating than any other two men on the "Blue Rock;" that John Endlund was a nice man and did not have it in for the union; that if Henry Larsen had Endlund's job he would fire every union man on the mine if he could; and that all the bosses at the mine were well liked by the men excepting Walter Suggs, and the reason they did not like him was because he was too much of a sucker and ran to Brown with everything he heard. Sullivan's job at the "Blue Rock" is general handy man, helping surveyor, etc.

Lund, the contractor for the union hall, was in town to-day. He expects to remain several days and try to straighten out the union hall tangle.

Respectfully submitted. ——— ———.

DEAR SIR: No. 36 reports:

EUREKA, Saturday, January 26, 1907.

To-day I was at the union office and around the saloons all day. There was nothing new of interest going on around town to-day nor at the union office. None of the men from the Blue Rock or other mines had anything of interest to say about the mines they were working in.

At the union meeting this evening about 100 members were present and two new members were initiated. The union decided to hold the demonstration meeting on February 17, even if they could get no outside speakers, and let local talent do the talking. Russell, Vance, Riddell, and Cramer were selected to enlighten the citizens as to the truth about the arrest of the W. F. M. officials in case no outside speaker could be secured. The union will purchase 1,000 copies of Justice McKenna's dissenting opinion in the Moyer-Haywood cases; also will get 1,000 copies of the anniversary edition of the Appeal to Reason, which will be distributed around the district. The union will also contribute the proceeds of its annual ball to be held February 8 to the defense fund, and will take up a subscription at the mass meeting to help swell the amount. Russell, Vance, and Cramer read articles from the Miners' Magazine and the Appeal to Reason relative to the Idaho cases, and endeavored by comments on them to stir up the membership of the union and make them feel that it was the duty of each and every one of them to do all in their power to liberate these men.

After the meeting I was around the saloons with Vance, Simpson, and others until 11 p. m., but learned nothing further of interest.

Respectfully submitted. ——— ———.

DEAR SIR: No. 36 reports:

EUREKA, Friday, February 1, 1907.

I was around the union office and saloons all day talking with Vance and other union leaders and miners. Cassidy, superintendent of the construction for the Bell Telephone Company, is trying to get Vance to take the position as local manager of the company. Vance came to me to-day, asking me to advise him whether to accept the position or not. I advised him to accept the position at once; told him he had a chance to better himself, and was always sure of a position with the company if he gave satisfaction; told him that the longer he worked for the union the worse he would be off, etc. He seemed to think my view of the matter was correct, and said he would talk the matter over with his wife and very likely take the position. I will do all I can to influence him, because there is no question but what he can be reelected as secretary of the union if he cares to run for the office.

There was nothing going on around town to-day which was of interest, and none of the miners I talked with had anything of interest to say about the Blue Rock or other mines.

Respectfully submitted. ——— ———.

DEAR SIR: No. 36 reports:

EUREKA, Saturday, February 2, 1907.

I was around the union office and saloons all day. There was very little of interest going on. I had a long talk with Vance to-day and did all I could to influence him to quit the union and take the position as manager of the Bell Telephone Company. I think he will take the place. With him out of the way I think the union will lose part of its membership and will be much more conservative. The union has no other member who will be as capable in the position as Vance is.

This evening I attended the regular meeting of the miners' union. About 100 members were in attendance. Three new members were initiated into the union. There was no business to come before the meeting. Several of the members made short speeches on unionism and socialism. Nothing else of interest occurred at the meeting.

After the meeting adjourned I was around the different saloons until 11 p. m., talking with different miners about the Blue Rock and other mines. None of them had any complaints to make about their work or their bosses, and according to what they say, everything is running smoothly at the Blue Rock and other mines. Jack Smith, shift boss at the Blue Rock, was gambling and drinking all last night and only worked one-half shift to-day. He gave as his excuse for quitting at noon, that his wife was going to Salt Lake on the afternoon train. Smith told me that his wife went on the train all right, but that is not the reason that he came home.

EUREKA, Sunday, February 3, 1907.

I was around the union office and saloons all day. To-day was change day at the mines and there were a good many men from the Blue Rock around the saloons. I talked to several of them about the mine, their work, etc., but did not learn anything of interest from them.

Vance is liable to take the telephone job. He wants $90 a month and the telephone company thinks that is a little too much. They want him to take $80, and he will not do it because he makes more than that working for the union. He told me this evening that he would not take the position for a cent less than $90 per month.

I have a chance to go to work here in town attending bar, beginning with the 10th of this month. As the arsenical lead poisoning I have got will prevent me from working in the mines for at least six weeks yet, and as the work will not in any way interfere with my other work, I am going to take the job, and by so doing can get all the information they have easier than I can now.

There was nothing of interest going on around town this evening. Fifteen or twenty miners were on a drunk, most of them leasers, but none of them had anything of interest to say.

THE SAME GAME IN MINNESOTA.

Upon the Mesabi range, in Minnesota, the miners and the mine owners have been having a lot of trouble. The Pinkertons were not long in getting into the field, because it was a good thing to push along. The more enmity they could stir up, the longer they would draw money from the mine owners. Here is a dispatch to the New York Worker, which lets in a little light on the subject and shows an absolute resemblance to operations in the West:

A number of miners have been arrested and tried on various charges connected with the strike on the Mesabi range in Minnesota. Courts at Hibbing, Naswauk, and Bovey have sent a number of miners to jail without any pretense of observing legal processes. Where jury trials have been secured the men have been acquitted in every instance. Detectives of the steel trust had one miner by the name of Grahek indicted, but it required but three minutes for the jury to acquit him. The "evidence" of the prosecution was of the same character that the Pinkertons gathered in the Haywood trial.

One juryman after the trial stated that if he had been in the defendant's place, and the company detectives attempted to enter his premises in the manner done in this case, he would have filled them so full of holes that they would be unable to commit any further trespass on any person's rights. Other jurors gave utterance to similar expressions.

"GOOD PICKING" IN WYOMING COLLIERIES.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, there is not very much known about the way things were done in Wyoming back in 1903, and I would like to add that things have been going on in pretty much the same way up to now. It is a story of how the United Mine Workers of America did not get into the Union Pacific Coal Company, which has its best properties at Rock Springs, Wyo. In that story is plenty of material for a melodrama and out of what was left over one could produce a very good three-act comedy or tragedy, as he wished it, with a character that would completely overtop the renowned Raffles for cleverness in appropriating the property of other persons; that is, Thomas J. Williams, on the Pinkerton books as No. 15. How Williams, by the uttermost arts of duplicity, baffled every effort of John Mitchell to unionize that district is a long story, but the essence of it is that Williams used the mails to tip off the meeting places of the organizers, with the result that Superintendent Black of the company, or some of his assistants, were always on the ground, midnight or noon, it made no difference about the time of day, and the consequence was that the cowed miners quit right now and left the floor to the organizers. That happened so often that they gave up the attempt to organize the district. But they are trying again and they were trying last winter. Operative Williams had sought surcease from the mental ghosts of his duplicity in the cup that cheers, so Olaf E. Erickson went out there in his place and to the Pinkerton office he reported, always through the United States mails, under the title of No. 20–D, which unconsciously makes one think of penitentiaries and things. But facts are that the reports I present are the ones which No. 20–D made to his home office through the mails, and I want to present them, Mr. Chairman:

DEAR SIR: No. 20–D reports:

ROCK SPRINGS, Wednesday, December 12, 1906.

I worked to-day and during the shift we were not very busy. I made several attempts to get my partner interested in a way to pay Jones for a change. He thought it would be all right, but hesitated about saying anything in favor of the plan. I will keep after him and see what he will do.

This evening I was at Delapicola's for an hour or so, then went over to the Dewey, and had a talk with Alf Flor, but was unable to get a chance to go into details with him. I went around to the Omaha and Navy. Things were very quiet, owing, I suppose, to the storm raging.

I discontinued at 9.30 p. m.

Respectfully submitted. ——— ———.

ROCK SPRINGS, Wednesday, December 12, 1906.

I worked the regular shift to-day. I talked with Jim Pollo, Charles Regis, and the drivers a little during the day, but we had not time to get interested in anything of importance. Jim Pollo and my partner said they would be at the Delapicola Saloon to-night and wanted me to be there.

This evening I went around to the Milwaukee, Navy, and Omaha saloons first, then went to the Delapicola Saloon. Louis Delapicola was on shift. I asked him if Jim Pollo had been there. He said, "Who do you mean? That U. P. sucker?" I said, "I don't know; I didn't know he was a U. P. sucker." He said, "Yes, I hear he used to be with the workingmen when he first went to work, but since that the company has got a hold on him." I learned he had reference to Pete Pollo, the timekeeper in the forty-seventh entry. I asked him concerning Jim Pollo, but he said, "I guess there isn't much difference between the two."

Pollo never showed up, but my partner did, and I met Pete Andrietta there. We got to talking of the better places to work in No. 1, and I finally got down to where Louis and I said we would offer $10 or $15 next pay day for a change. Louis agreed to it, but before that time comes he is likely to have a talk with Fontana about it; then maybe it will be all right and maybe not. Anyway, it is all I can do to find out something and can't hurt anything. They say that it must be a fact that Jones is accepting money from the men. We talked of other subjects for some time, and I discontinued at 10 p. m.

Respectfully submitted. ——— ———.

DEAR SIR: No. 20–D reports:

ROCK SPRINGS, Tuesday, December 18, 1906.

I worked the regular shift to-day. My partner went to the U. P. office last night to see Jones about being changed to work with Fontana. Fontana's partner is going to work at No. 9 with his brother-in-law and has already quit No. 1 and was to start at No. 9 to-day.

Jones told Louis to wait five or six days and he would see about it, but thought he would get the place all right. Fontana's partner was at the office at the same time Louis was.

Louis asked me if Fontana's partner asked Jones if he could come back and get a good place in No. 1 in case he didn't like No. 9, and Jones told him yes.

I talked with Louis about why Jones wanted him to wait five or six days before being changed. He said he didn't know. I asked him if he had put up anything. He said, "No; not yet," but we will see him again. Louis told me Jones visits Anton Facinelli's saloon frequently. We knock off at 5.30 p. m.

This evening I was at Aho's saloon with Sam Force and Ike Maki and met Herman Mikleson and Ike Jervi there, and also two more that I didn't know by name. I spent an hour or so talking with them, then went to Facinelli's saloon. I asked for Louis Fedel and found that Louis had not been there, and it was not likely he would be after that hour, so I went to the Palace where a number of U. P. drivers were. I joined them, but heard nothing of interest.

I discontinued at 10 p. m.

DEAR SIR: No. 20–D reports:

ROCK SPRINGS, Thursday, February 21, 1907.

I spent the day at different resorts, a great deal with Martello and Facinelli. We talked of nearly everything. Martello is trying to sell out his place and leave town. He had not heard anything about the organizer, and I obtained nothing new.

I then met Ike Jervi. He was off to-day, so I was around with him for some time, and we met Gus Sillimaki. He told me he came here from Hanna, that he had been there for two months and his parents live there, and that he was a clothing salesman for a Chicago firm. He used to run a saloon in this town where the Milwaukee now is. I got nothing new out of him.

When I met Ike Jervi about this other man I heard was here from Hanna a couple of days ago he told me there was a Finn here from Hanna who tried to get the use of the Finn hall, but said the Finns here were afraid and wouldn't let him use it. I told him I had heard the hall was engaged, but Ike said no; that that was not the reason, but it was because the Finns here were afraid.

Wessman was pretty busy to-day, and I was unable to talk with him. This man I have mentioned as Harkman is named Harcomb, and is assistant shipping clerk for the U. P. I had quite a talk with him this evening, and while he does not say anything for or against unions, he is kicking about his salary, and says that unless he gets a raise of $15 per month soon he intends to leave.

I visited the Wyoming, Milwaukee, Omaha, and Navy saloons, but everything was very quiet this evening, and not many of the men were out.

DEAR SIR: No. 20–D reports:

ROCK SPRINGS, Saturday, January 19, 1907.

I worked to-day in the same place. Nothing of interest occurred during the shift. At 5 o'clock I met Fontana and Jim Pollo near the slope. We talked for a short while. Fontana told me again that as soon as we finished this room he thought he would get a good place to work, so there is no use to press him now. I will ask my partner if he has any particular place that he wants to work in, then see Fontana and get him to see Jones about it. We quit at 5.30 p. m.

This evening I visited several resorts. I spent some time at the Delapicola Saloon talking with Louis Delapicola. My partner had been there looking for me, but left before I got there. From there I went to the Palace, then to the Dewey Saloon and met Jim Harris, Billy Iredale, and Sam Morgon. I heard nothing of interest from these men. I then went to the Navy Saloon, where I met Keeler and Hieronomous, a fireman and brakeman on the branch between here and Superior. Hieronomous, the brakeman, was complaining about having too much work and said he would not stay if it were not for the extra money they made from men going to and from Rock Springs, which, he says, amounts to several dollars some days; and in speaking of Clarke, who has charge of that train, they said he was all right and splits the money among them. They said George Branscombe, the man who used to have that train, was the boy to get the money. I discontinued at 11 p. m.

To-day I did not work in the mine, as the hoist is still out of order on the east side, so I put in the day at the different saloons; spent the biggest part of the time at the Geneva Saloon talking with Jim Hill and Emil Latanzi. They are both strong union sympathizers and union men and again said they wished this town was organized, but outside of talking in favor of unions nothing of interest was said. I wanted to talk with Latanzi about Jones, but did not get the chance. Latanzi is popular, speaks several languages, and may know something about Jones.

This evening I spent at the Milwaukee and Navy saloons. Things were very quiet to-night all over town. At the Navy I met Murphy, Jack Martin, C. Riddle, and John Maxwell. They also did some union talking. They think that eight hours is long enough to work in the mines.

Later I met William Howells, Billy Iredale, and Tom Davis, and talked with them for some time, but learned nothing new, and discontinued at 10 p. m.

I didn't work to-day. I went to the Omaha, Navy, and Geneva saloons, but everything was pretty quiet.

At the Navy this evening I met several No. 2 drivers. Among them was Tom Sheffield. He mentioned being over in Dillon, Wyo., and said it was a strong union camp and that he belonged there and believed strongly in unions.

I went into the Omaha again, also over the Palace. It was the U. P. Company's pay day, but everything was quiet all over town except at the Geneva, where I met Jack Nordberg, Talso, Savola, Tovio, Henry Maki, John Maki, Jervi Mickelson, Jim Hill, George Harris, and several others, but did not learn anything new.

I then went to Aho's, but there was no one in there. Since Jervi went out to work at the Geneva, all the Finns have left Aho's.

I discontinued at 12 midnight.

ROCK SPRINGS, Tuesday, February 12, 1907.

I worked the regular shift to-day. My partner changed to room 70, 46 entry, to-day and I was given another partner, a Pete Rich, recently from Louisville, Colo. The man who worked with me for three days is Pete Bonini. This new man, Pete Rich, I questioned to-day about Louisville, and whether he belonged to the union or not, but he didn't say he did, although he seems to believe in unions. He speaks several languages and is French, he says. I believe he is an Austrian. Nothing of interest occurred during the day.

I had a talk with Fontana and Fedel while waiting for the trip. They said I was lucky to get rid of Pete Bonini.

I spent this evening at the Howard and met several Finn men. From Ike Jervi I got the information this Chris ——— (something)—Talso told me the other night Chris Lapland, but Jervi doesn't know the name—was a Socialist and had held a meeting here on the subject; but the Finns did not take much interest in him, as he is known as a schemer, etc. Then, in regard to this stock proposition I mentioned, that is now being done by Henry Havola, an old-timer here, but has just returned from Finland. On his way here he stopped off in Colorado and Telluride, where several Finns are interested in mining on the cooperative plan, and says these Finns working in No. 1 are fools, etc., working in a place like that when they can go to other places, say Telluride, for one, and get more money and work eight hours. Havola does not intend to stay here very long, but will go to California in the interest of the miners in Finland.

I also met Pete Rich at the Howard, and Joe Patterson. They were talking of old times at Louisville. Also met Wessman, Harry Knopela, and several more Finns, but nothing of interest was obtained from and several more Finns, but nothing of interest was obtained from them.

Respectfully submitted. ——— ———.

DEAR SIR: No. 20–D reports:

ROCK SPRINGS, Wednesday, February 13, 1907.

I worked the regular shift to-day. My partner is disgusted with the place already and says he is going to tell Jones that he stuck him in the worst place in the mine. He is going to ask for a change. I told him he may get a change if he gives Jones a piece of coin, but it didn't take well with him. He said he never paid a boss for a job in his life and wouldn't. I told him he had better stay with me until we finished the room now, even if we didn't make much, and we might get a good place after we got through, so he may not say anything to Jones.

Nothing of interest was obtained through the day and we knocked off at 5.30 p. m.

This evening I again visited the Howard, where, as usual, in the evening, I met a number of men. I met Louis Jurick, who told me about the machine runners at No. 10 going out on strike for a 5 per cent raise. I could not learn who the men were that started it, or was the cause of them going out, except he said they were either Austrians or Italians, and he wished everybody who worked in the mines would go out for higher wages.

Fred Highley is a driver at No. 10. I started the same subject with him and he said: "Don't tell me the Italians and Austrians aren't good union men. See how they went out." He doesn't know who the leader of the men is; said it is kept very quiet and it is all between themselves (the machine runners). He said: "They will stay out until they get the raise." He said to-day they had company men running the machines at $3.50 per day, but says that won't last long as they only cut about one room per day and that was costing more than the other men even with the 5 per cent raise. I heard something about the drivers at No. 10 thinking of kicking for a raise, but from Highley I learned that there is nothing to that.

I also met Victor Talso, August Czar, Henry Knopala, Frend Williams, Dominick Paruka, Joe Dretta, Joe Dyett, and several others there. I spent some time among them, but heard nor learned nothing of importance.

Respectfully submitted. ——— ———.

WHAT IS THE OBJECTION TO THE BILL?

Many more letters of the same kind could be offered, but these are sufficient—for they are all very similar—to show the character of the matter that the mails are carrying at the instance of the detective agencies. That there might be no mistake as to the truth of my contentions, the foregoing letters are offered to show that this unprincipled business could not thrive were it not for the use of the United States mails, and which, if permitted to be used, must continue this species and quality of scoundrelism.

Can there be any objection, if we are willing to accord fair and just treatment to labor unions and to the work they are doing for the betterment of society generally, to the enactment of this bill into a law? I can see none.

I have spoken briefly of the cunning and skulking work of the Pinkertons. It could not be worse. It is a kind of by-product of the mad race for riches, prompted and sustained by the arrogant power of wealth.

In the lowest strata of human nature work these vermin of corruption, but how much better are the men who employ them and who pay them to degrade themselves? And yet some of these very men become prominent in the legislative halls and assemblies of the country and make patriotic speeches about constitutional government, the Army, and the Navy. They are always for the Army and the Navy, the great bulwarks of organized capital, for behind them capital feels safe. But how about the industrial slave, driven from pillar to post and turned out of his job, without notice or warning in times of industrial depression and money shortage, to starve or to beg? There are not many who make speeches in his behalf and point out how his condition is to be made better, so that he and his family can have bread and some of the good things of life.

What I have said represents, to my mind, one angle of what might be termed a triangle of organized powers which clutch the proletariat of this country. This power is base and iniquitous. It represents the brutal power of money, mad with the spirit of commercialism, without a shadow of mercy, hard, and from every point unbrotherly It is the tiger of capitalism in action, aided and in a degree made respectable by the post-office establishment.

THE SECOND POWER.

The dear public, the bourgeoisie, is the second force, and is always looking for help against the violence of labor unions from the courts, the legislatures, and the Congress. The public is fond of arbitration for the reason that society, of which it is the biggest part, makes up the board, and the award is almost certain to be in favor of respectability. The property of the dear public must be protected against injury by the conflicts of labor and capital. The workers must be content. They can get along on poor fare, shabby clothes, and a three-room rented cottage, and do without legislation; for legislation is for the public and property. The profits all belong to capital. What boots it if the workers do suffer? Have they not been used to it for all the years gone by? I am of the opinion, however, that it is about time that some of the burdens were distributed and borne by different classes of society rather than be endured in the main by one class. I am for a division of profits, burdens, and suffering, even if the innocent public be called upon to bear its portion. But I can not pursue this phase of the subject any further.

COMMISSION'S REPORT ON GOLDFIELD.

However, in order that the public may get a correct understanding of the labor troubles in the West for the last decade or two and that it may know to what extent the detective agencies have contributed to the violent conflicts, as the agents of the property class, between labor and capital, and in exoneration, measurably, of the workingmen of the West, most of whom are members of the Western Federation of Miners, I desire in this connection to call attention to the recent message of the President, which contains a report on the imaginary labor troubles in Goldfield, Nev., and which was sent into this House on February 3, 1908, in compliance with a resolution which I had the honor to introduce on January 14, calling for the report of the special commission appointed by the President to examine into the Goldfield labor trouble.

The same effort on the part of capitalism, to stir up strife and to arouse the country against the miners of the West at Goldfield was attempted to be done in letters from the governor of Nevada. Although the report does not mention the commercial detective as being present, yet I assure you that he was there in full force and fully alive to his engagements with the companies. In his letters, Governor Sparks, of Nevada, expressed in strong and unequivocal terms that nothing but the military could prevent an uprising of the Western Federation of Miners that would be as destructive of property and human life as a similar uprising had been in the Coeur d'Alene district of northern Idaho in 1899 and in the Cripple Creek district of Colorado in 1903 to 1906. But the President's attention was aroused by a published statement in the eastern newspapers that the mine owners were about to make a general reduction of wages and inaugurate some new methods in the handling of their business, unfriendly to labor. This prompted him to appoint a commission of three honest men, fearless public servants. They went to the field of action and informed themselves of the trouble which it was pretended was threatened, and their conclusions are embodied in the President's message to which I have referred. And it must be admitted by all that this report is to the credit of the Western Federation of Miners and to the condemnation of the Mine Owners' Association of the State of Nevada.

I desire to say that if a similar commission had gone to the Coeur d'Alene district in 1899 and made the same kind of an examination that was made in Goldfield last December and January, the troops would never have been called into that district and the atrocities of the bull pens at Wallace and Wardner would not be a matter of history that is most discreditable to the persons who took part in it, for the prime cause of those troubles was the same overbearing tactics recently undertaken in the Goldfield district. The same statement may be truthfully said about the troubles in the Cripple Creek district. And had a similar report been made at the beginning of the trouble in that district and reported to the world through the Congress of the United States, the horrors of the blowing up of the Independence depot and the Victor mines, and the destruction of life and property that followed—the bull pen, the deportation of innocent miners, and the fruitless trial of Haywood, which cost the State of Idaho more than $100,000—would not now stain the history of Colorado as to its labor troubles.

I desire to make this report a part of my speech, for it should be read in all parts of the United States, as giving a faithful and correct account of the labor troubles of the entire West. The President's message, in which the report is incorporated, is as follows:

The House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State with copies of papers called for by the resolution of the House of Representatives on January 22, 1908, reading as follows:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the interests of the public service, a copy of the report made to him by the special commission, composed of Lawrence O. Murray, Herbert Knox Smith, and Charles P. Neill, sent by him to Goldfield, Nev., for the purpose of investigating the labor troubles in that district and to make a report concerning the same; and also such other papers relating thereto as in his judgment are material and for the better information of the House."

THE PRESIDENT, Washington, D. C.:

I am informed Governor Sparks of Nevada has sent you important telegram relation to critical situation in Nevada which needs immediate action. Hope it will be possible for you to grant his request. Senator NEWLANDS and Congressman BARTLETT can give further particulars and I will return to Washington this afternoon if you desire personal interview. Address Waldorf.

CARSON CITY, NEV., December 3–4, 1907.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States.

MR. PRESIDENT: It now seems apparent that in the near future Nevada may expect serious labor troubles in the district of Goldfield and adjoining camps, which may result in violence and great destruction of both life and property. The State has no enrolled militia and if it had I doubt very much whether it would be effective in maintaining law and order. I am this day in communication with our Congressional representatives urging them to consult with you concerning conditions above stated, and as we now see them, it appears to me, as governor of Nevada, that it is my duty to ask if you can consistently give us assurance that we may depend upon immediate relief from the Presidio Barracks. I assure you, Mr. President, I am aware of the fact and consider it an extraordinary request to be made by any governor of the United States, but the existence of the case seems to require it at this time. I am informed that desperate men are now securing dynamite and arms to destroy property and human life. The sheriff of the county seems to be absolutely unable to cope with the situation. A committee of mine owners, mine operators, and mill operators from the Goldfield district is now in consultation with me, and I assure you, Mr. President, that they are well satisfied that we need relief. We have no military garrison in the State of Nevada and a small detachment of Federal troops stationed at Goldfield would certainly relieve the situation.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SPARKS, Governor of Nevada.
R. C. STODDARD, Attorney-General.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 4, 1907.

Hon. JOHN SPARKS,
Governor, Carson City, Nev.:

Telegram received 3.05 o'clock this afternoon. The Federal Government is prepared to send detachment of troops at any moment, subject, of course, to your making call under conditions prescribed by the United States Constitution and statutes as set forth in sections 5297 and 5299 of the Revised Statutes, these two sections carrying out section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution. The call of the governor must itself recite such a condition of affairs in accordance with the terms of the laws above referred to as will warrant the Preisdent in acting. I have ordered not to exceed two companies to be ready to move immediately if you make such request, as two companies would, I suppose, amount to the small detachment of which you speak.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

CARSON, NEV., December 5, 1907.

His Excellency THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

At Goldfield, Esmeralda County, State of Nevada, there does now exist domestic violence and unlawful combinations and conspiracies which do now so obstruct and continue to so obstruct and hinder the execution of the laws of the State of Nevada and now deprive and continue to deprive the people of said section of the State of the rights, privileges, immunities, and protection named in the Constitution of the United States and of the State of Nevada and which are secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, and immunities; and the constituted authorities of the State of Nevada are now and continue to be unable to protect the people in such rights, and the reason of such inability and the particulars thereof are the following, to wit, unlawful dynamiting of property, commission of felonies, threats against the lives and property of law-abiding citizens, the unlawful possession of arms and ammunition, and the confiscation of dynamite with threats of the unlawful use of the same by preconcerted action.

The lawfully constituted authorities of this State are unable to apprehend and punish the perpetrators of said crimes and to prevent the commission of other threatened crimes, and unless the relief hereinafter requested is granted this State and the lives and property of large numbers of its people will be irreparably affected and damaged, contrary to the peace and dignity of the United States and of the State of Nevada.

Therefore, pursuant to Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States, and to sections 5297 and 5298 of the Revised Statutes thereof, I, John Sparks, governor, do hereby respectfully request that Your Excellency Theodore Roosevelt, President, do immediately send to Goldfield, Esmeralda County, Nev., two companies of the troops of the Army of the United States to suppress unlawful disorder and violence, to protect life and property, to restore peace, and to insure protection of law to the people of the State of Nevada.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed at the capitol, Carson City, Nev., on this 5th day of December, A. D. 1907.

JOHN SPARKS, Governor.

Hon. JOHN SPARKS,
Governor, Carson, Nev.:

I have received your request for troops made in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States and will accordingly immediately direct that a sufficient number of troops be sent to Nevada. The number must be determined by the military authorities.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., December 10, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I join with Senator NIXON and Representative BARTLETT, of Nevada, in the request that you select some representative to go to Nevada and make a careful examination into existing conditions with a view to the maintenance of peace and good order, and that you retain the troops at Goldfield until after you have received the report of such representative.

Very respectfully, yours, FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 13, 1907.

The SECRETARY OF STATE:

I transmit herewith copies of correspondence between myself and the governor of Nevada and the Senators and Member of the Lower House from Nevada and the War Department. In accordance with the request of Governor Sparks, and for the reasons set forth therein, this request being supported by the request of the two Senators and Member of the Lower House from Nevada, I have ordered troops to be sent to Nevada so that they will be available in the event that the situation contemplated by the Constitution and the laws and apprehended by the governor of Nevada shall arise.

Will you please procure from the War Department all papers bearing upon this subject? Please communicate with the governor of Nevada as to the steps on the part of the government of that State which will be a necessary precedent to further action on the part of the Federal Government.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

(The Secretary of State to Governor Sparks.)

[Telegram.]

DECEMBER 14, 1907.

Hon. JOHN SPARKS,
Governor, Carson City, Nev.:

The President has transmitted to the Department of State the correspondence between the governor of Nevada and the President of the United States relating to the use of national troops in relation to certain disturbances existing or anticipated at Goldfield, in the State of Nevada. The President has instructed me to advise you officially that he has caused several companies of the Regular Army to proceed to the locality in which such disturbances exist or are anticipated, to the end that they may be available in case the occasion contemplated by the Constitution and the laws of the United States for their interposition shall arise.

The calls upon the President on the part of the government of Nevada for the interposition of troops do not at present satisfy the requirements of the Constitution and the laws so as to justify orders that the military force now at Goldfield shall take any affirmative action. If such action should be desired under the Constitution and section 5297 of the Revised Statutes to suppress an insurrection, a call must be made by the legislature of the State, unless circumstances are such that the legislature can not be convened, and no statement or intimation has been made that the legislature of Nevada can not be convened. Action under section 5298 of the Revised Statutes relates only to the enforcement of the laws of the United States. Action under section 5299 of the Revised Statutes is to be taken not upon the call of the government of a State, but upon the judgment of the President of the United States that some portion or class of the people of a State are denied the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States. Action under this section requires the production of evidence of specific facts sufficient to sustain a judgment by the President that the condition described in the statute exists.

A mere statement of domestic disturbance would not seem to be sufficient.

The facts thus far stated in the telegraphic communications from the governor of Nevada, high and unimpeachable as is the source, do not seem sufficient to sustain a judgment that the condition described in section 5299 exists.

It therefore appears that the communications thus far received from the government of Nevada do not constitute or furnish the basis for authority on the part of the President to direct the use of the armed forces of the United States in the maintenance of public order at Goldfield.

I respectfully suggest that if in your judgment such interposition is needed you furnish further evidence of facts justifying action by the President under section 5298 or 5299, or cause the legislature of Nevada to be convened and to make the necessary call in accordance with the Constitution and section 5297 of the Revised Statutes.

(Received December 16—9.20 a. m.)

The PRESIDENT, Washington, D. C.:

Fourteenth from Secretary of State. Submit that conditions in Goldfield necessitates presence but does not warrant active intervention of United States troops. However, am prepared to submit affidavits of more than one hundred representative citizens that they have been deprived of their rights as citizens of the United States and of State of Nevada. Arrival of troops in Goldfield undoubtedly prevented rioting and other disorder, as is shown by statements of same people, including sheriff. Although active intervention of United States troops not now necessary, withdrawal at present would unquestionably precipitate disorder which local and State authorities would be unable to control. In the event of rioting and other disorder justifying military intervention will make requisition in accordance with statutes.

Desire to express appreciation of your prompt action in sending United States troops here, which relieved a most critical condition, and hope that you can retain troops here until present troubles are adjusted. Expect to remain as long as necessary.

[Telegram.]

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 17, 1907.

Hon. JOHN SPARKS,
Governor of Nevada, Goldfield, Nev.:

I sent the troops at your request because from the tenor of your telegrams and from the representations made me by the two Senators from Nevada and the Member of the Lower House of Congress from Nevada it appeared that an insurrection was imminent, against which the State authorities would be powerless. The troops have now been in Goldfield ten days and no insurrection has occurred and seemingly no circumstances exist to justify your now calling on me for action by the troops under the provision of the Constitution. The troops were sent to Goldfield to be ready to meet a grave emergency which seemed likely at once to arise and to provide a substitute for the exercise by the State of its police function. I do not feel at liberty to leave them indefinitely under such circumstances that they will in effect be performing on the part of the United States those ordinary duties of maintaining public order in the State of Nevada which rest upon the State government. As the legislature of Nevada has not been convened, I am bound to assume that the powers already vested in the peace officers of the State are adequate, and that if they choose to do so they can maintain order themselves. Under these circumstances, unless there be forthwith further cause shown to justify keeping the troops at Goldfield, I shall direct that they return to their former station.

The PRESIDENT, Washington, D. C.:

We do find no warrant for statement that there has been or is a complete collapse of civil authority here. All the machinery of civil government has been in operation, but has been ineffective in dealing with certain forms of crime because local sentiment has nullified its action. On question of deportation, the evidence only sustains at the very maximum probably twenty-five cases in the last two years. Last March a very acute labor dispute existed, lasting some weeks, in which the city was practically an armed camp. Since then the best evidence we have indicates the number with arms ordinarily is no larger than commonly found in mining camps. Representatives of trades in American Federation of Labor here all agree that practically no members of their crafts have felt any occasion to carry arms since acute condition of last March. Our investigation so far completely has failed to sustain the general and sweeping allegations in the governor calling for troops, and the impression as to conditions here given in that call is misleading and without warrant. We do find no evidence that any condition then existed not easily controlled by the local authorities. Neither immediately preceding nor since the arrival of troops has there been any particular disorder, but immediately after arrival of troops mine owners announced reduction of wages from $5 to $4, and positively refused employment to all men who do not agree to renounce in writing the local union, although a law of Nevada prohibits such requirement. Large majority of our witnesses assert very earnestly that if troops should be withdrawn now and owners insist upon above requirements there will result serious violence directed against life and property. Rifles in considerable numbers brought in by both sides some time ago are still believed to be in their possession. Many say they will leave as soon as possible if troops should be withdrawn, and we believe that many of them are sincere in these assertions. The sheriff, two out of three of the county commissioners, two members of the legislature, and the district attorney, representing nearly all civil authority of the county, have been before us to-night in long conference.

So far as can be learned no county officer was consulted by governor previous to calling for troops. All still resent his action and consider it was unnecessary. They do not believe there has been any need for troops here up to date, but they all further agree and have given us signed statement to the effect that the new element brought into situation since arrival of troops creates a dangerous condition, and they recommend troops be left here until present difficulties are adjusted. Although desiring the continuance of troops here, and notwithstanding they have given us a signed statement to that effect, they evade the assumption of any responsibility and specifically refuse to say that local authorities would be unable to maintain law and order if should be withdrawn. These men are trying to secure the benefit of Federal assistance to more easily maintain the public order for which they are responsible and at the same time place the responsibility on the President. The governor states to us in writing that he will not convene the legislature to consider call for troops nor will he take the necessary steps to form a State military, as is legally provided for, and that if the troops should be withdrawn he will do substantially nothing. In other words, the State authorities propose to do nothing, but wholly rely on the Federal authorities. There has been substantial agreement by everybody who appeared before us that the number of violent or (criminal) men in the organization here is certainly less than 200. With a population of about 14,000 people there would seem to be no good reason why the civil authorities here can not take care of their own city. If should be withdrawn we strongly recommend that at least ten days' notice be given of such decision in order to give the sheriff time to prepare fully. We expect our work will be completed December 21, and we will leave here that day.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 20, 1907.

Hon. JOHN SPARKS,
Governor of Nevada, Goldfield, Nev.:

I have received no answer from you to my telegram of December 17, in which I said that unless there was forthwith further cause shown to justify keeping the troops at Goldfield I should direct their return to their former stations. I am informed by the three representatives of the Department of Commerce and Labor who are in Goldfield by my order that you have stated to them in writing that you will not convene the legislature to consider call for troops nor take the necessary steps to form a State military force. Their report further satisfies me that there is no disturbance threatened which the government of Nevada ought not to be able to control if it starts to work with a serious purpose to do so, but that no effort is being made by the government of Nevada to take the steps necessary in the matter. I stand ready to see that the National Government does its full constitutional duty in the matter of preserving order, but this readiness on the part of the National Government does not excuse the State government for failure to perform its full duty in the first place. Federal aid should not be sought for by the State as a method of relieving itself from the performance of this duty, and the State should not be permitted to substitute the Government of the United States for the government of the State in the ordinary duties of maintaining order within the State. For the reasons given in this and my former telegram I have accordingly directed the troops to return to their former stations on Monday, December 30, next.

CARSON, NEV., December 26, 1907.

The PRESIDENT, Washington:

As chief magistrate of the State of Nevada, I have been of the opinion for the past year that a condition bordering on domestic violence and insurrection has existed in the Goldfield mining district. There has been an almost constant state of war between the miners' union and the mine owners, who employ the members of the union. During the year 1907 practically one-fourth of the time was occupied in actual strikes, and several months in agitations about other strikes. Without considering the merit of any of the controversies, it is only necessary to state that the entire district became divided into two hostile camps—on the one hand the miners, with their adherents and sympathizers, and on the other hand the mine owners, with their adherents and sympathizers. The union alone claimed a membership of 3,000, and fully one-half of the membership were constantly armed. Arms and ammunition were purchased and kept by the union as a body. On the other hand the mine owners had in their employ a large number of watchmen and guards, who were constantly armed and on duty. In addition to these forces were an unusually large number of the criminal element attracted to the new and booming mining camp. Under such conditions the civil authorities were practically powerless. They could attend to the ordinary petty offenders from day to day, but at the first conflict between the real armies of labor and capital they would have been swept away.

The repeated strikes and continued threats of other strikes irritated the mine owners more and more. It was clear to me, therefore, that when the last strike was called in the midst of the financial crisis spreading over the country, and with a long winter facing the 20,000 people situated upon the desert, hundreds of miles from any centers of population, that it was time to recognize the actual condition of affairs and to act accordingly. A state of domestic violence and insurrection arises, in my judgment, when armed bodies are in existence with sufficient power to overcome the civil authorities, and continual threats were made of the destruction of life and property. This condition has existed in the Goldfield mining districts the past year and exists there now. It calls for the presence of the troops to keep the peace. As this condition has been of slow growth it will take time to remove it. In my judgment, it is necessary that troops be kept at Goldfield an indefinite period of time. They should remain there until both sides are shown that the district is not to remain an armed camp and a scene of continual warfare. The communist and anarchist must seek new fields; the laboring man be convinced that arbitration and peaceful methods are more certain and lasting methods of improving his condition than by dynamite and the shotgun. This can only come about with time, and for the present and some time in the future the strong arm of the military must be in evidence to convince all that no other method will be tolerated. It is known as a matter of legislative history that I recommended a measure at the last session having for its object the establishment of a State constabulary along the lines of the Texas Rangers, which was rejected by that body, the members thereof still being in office. The assembly of that session, with the vote of all but one, passed a resolution denouncing the injustice done Moyer, Haywood, and Pettibone, by the denial of a speedy trial. The resolution, however, was tabled by the senate. It is a matter of only a few weeks since I called for the opinions of different representatives and individual citizens of the State generally as to the advisability of convening a special session to act upon a then existing emergency, which, however, did not relate to the present situation. The expressions received at that time indicated that 95 per cent of the people were opposed to such an extra session. For geographical reasons and on account of the customary ten days' notice to members, it would be impossible to convene and organize a special session of the legislature in less than three weeks, presuming on the most expeditious action on the part of the members. For these reasons I deem it impossible to convene the legislature in special session to meet the present emergency, and still think it highly inadvisable.

This telegram was in course of preparation on the 7th instant, in reply to your telegram of that date, but I was taken ill and have only just returned to my office. I am now sending it in lieu of a letter which I wired you was in course of preparation. The delay was not intentional on my part and no discourtesy meant thereby.

(The Secretary of State to Mr. Loeb.)

DECEMBER 27, 1907.

DEAR MR. LOEB: I inclose a draft of a telegram which has been agreed upon in conference this morning between Secretary Taft, General Oliver, yourself, and myself as a suitable answer for the President to make to the telegram of December 26 from the governor of Nevada.

Yours, very truly,

ELIHU ROOT.

WILLIAM LOEB, Jr.,
Secretary to the President, The White House.

DECEMBER 28, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I send you herewith two copies of the President's telegram of to-day to Governor Sparks, which contains certain modifications of the draft approved by Secretary Taft and you.

The President has wired me to notify Messrs. Murray, Smith, and Neill to meet him at the White House at 9 o'clock Monday evening, and he requests me to ask you if you can come to the White House at the same time. Will you let me know as to this?

Very truly, yours,

WM. LOEB, Jr.,
Secretary to the President.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 28, 1907.

Hon. JOHN SPARKS,
Governor, Carson City, Nev.:

Your telegram December 26 is received. It, in effect, declares that you have failed to call the legislature together because, in your judgment, the legislature would not call upon the Government of the United States for the use of troops, although, in your opinion, it ought to do so. The Constitution of the United States imposes, not upon you, but upon the legislature, if it can be convened, the duty of calling upon the Government of the United States to protect the State of Nevada against domestic violence. You now request me to use the armed forces of the United States in violation of the Constitution because, in your judgment, the legislature would fail to perform its duty under the Constitution. The State government certainly does not appear to have made any serious effort to do its duty by the effective enforcement of its police functions. I repeat again what I have already said to you several times—that under the circumstances now existing in the State of Nevada as made known to me, an application from the legislature of the State is an essential condition to the indefinite continuance of the troops at Goldfield. Circumstances may change, and if they do I will take whatever action the needs of the situation require so far as my constitutional powers permit. But the first need is that the State authorities should do their duty, and the first step toward this is the assembling of the legislature. It is apparent from your telegram that the legislature of Nevada can readily be convened. You have fixed the period of three weeks as the time necessary to convene and organize a special session. If within five days from the receipt of this telegram you shall have issued the necessary notice to convene the legislature of Nevada, I shall continue the station of the troops at Goldfield during such period of three weeks. If within the term of five days such notice has not been issued, the troops will be immediately returned to their former stations.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

RENO, NEV., December 29, 1907.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States:

I am now preparing proclamation for extra session of Nevada legislature. Will forward same to you when complete. Many thanks for your message.

(The Secretary of State to Senator NEWLANDS.)

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 30, 1907.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I sent you a copy of the President's dispatch to the governor of Nevada of this date, and also a copy of my dispatch of November 14.

Faithfully, yours,

ELIHU ROOT.

Hon. F. G. NEWLANDS,
United States Senate.

CARSON, NEV., December 30, 1907.

The PRESIDENT, Washington:

Copy of proclamation calling special session of the legislature to convene January 14 mailed you to-day. Will rush matters to adjustment as rapidly as possible.

JOHN SPARKS, Governor.

(Proclamation by Governor of Nevada.)

STATE OF NEVADA—PROCLAMATION BY THE GOVERNOR.

To the honorable the members of the twenty-third session of the legislature of the State of Nevada.

GENTLEMEN: The constitution of this State, Article V, Section IX, provides that "the governor may, on extraordinary occasions, convene the legislature by proclamation, and shall state to both houses, when organized, the purpose for which they have been convened, and the legislature shall transact no legislative business except that for which they were specially convened, or such other legislative business as the governor may call to the attention of the legislature while in session."

Believing that an extraordinary occasion now exists and one which the legislature, being a coordinate branch of the State government, is best prepared to solve, it becomes my duty, by proclamation, to convene the legislature at Carson City, Nev., on the 14th day of January, A. D. 1908.

This request has been made by many citizens, the object being to adjust by legislation, if possible, the controversy existing between the miners and mine owners at Goldfield, this State. Such legislation should be general in character and impartially applicable for the restoration and preservation of law and order.

Under the constitution, as above cited, the governor shall state to both houses, when organized, the purpose for which they have been convened. When that time arrives, I will endeavor to outline to you the necessary legislation required, and will give hearty cooperation in the attempt to secure to every citizen of Nevada their just rights freely to be exercised under the law.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of State to be affixed. Done at Carson City, State of Nevada, this 30th day of December, A. D. 1907.

[SEAL.] JOHN W. SPARKS, Governor.

Attest:
W. G. DOUGLASS,
Secretary of State.

(The President to Governor Sparks.)

WASHINGTON, January 4, 1908.

SIR: I have received the copy of your proclamation, dated December 30, 1907, summoning the legislature. As I have notified you, the troops will stay for three weeks from the date of this call, so that the legislature can meet and opportunity be given the State authorities to take efficient action for the preservation of the public peace in the exercise of the police powers of the State. I call your special attention to the telegram sent to you on December 14 by the Secretary of State. This sets out what must be shown as a matter of actual fact to exist in order to warrant the President in acting on the request of the State authorities. The action must be either to suppress an insurrection which the State authorities are unable to suppress, or to secure to some portion or class of the people of the State the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States, and which is denied them. Action under this or any other section requires the production of evidence sufficient to sustain a judgment by the President that the condition described in the statute exists. A mere statement of domestic disturbance, still less a mere statement of apprehension of domestic disturbance, is not sufficient, even though it comes from as high and unimpeachable a source as the governor of a State. Such communication from the governor or from the legislature warrants the President in taking immediate steps to put himself in readiness to act, in view of the probability of conditions arising which will require his action. I accordingly sent the troops to Nevada on your request, and I have now directed that they be kept there pending the assembling of the legislature. Meanwhile, I sent out Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor Lawrence O. Murray, Commissioner of Corporations Herbert Knox Smith, and Commissioner of Labor Charles P. Neill to investigate and report to me the actual condition of affairs in Goldfield. I have just received a report from these three gentlemen, which sets forth in the most emphatic language their belief, after a careful investigation on the ground, that there was no warrant whatever for calling upon the President for troops, and that the troops should not be kept indefinitely at Goldfield. The report further states that there was no insurrection against the power of the State at the time the troops were called for, that nobody supposed that there was such an insurrection, and that none of the conditions described in section 5297–5299 of the Revised Statutes as warranting interference by the Federal Government existed, and that the effort was and is plainly an effort by the State of Nevada to secure the performance by the United States of the ordinary police duties which should, as a matter of course, be performed by Nevada herself. The report further says:

"There is absolutely no question that if the State of Nevada and the county of Esmeralda exercised the powers at their disposal they can maintain satisfactory order in Goldfield; that so far these authorities have done nothing, but are relying upon Federal aid, and their attitude now is expressly that of refusing to do anything and desiring to throw their own burdens upon the Federal Government for the maintenance of those elementary conditions of order for which they, and they only, are responsible.

The signers of the report express their conviction that the troops should remain in Nevada until the assembling of the legislature, so as to preserve the status quo in order that the legislature may deal with the situation as it exists; but that shortly thereafter the troops should be removed.

I agree with the recommendations of this report, of which I inclose a copy, and shall act accordingly. Unless it can be shown that the statements of the report are not in accordance with the facts, it will be incumbent upon the legislature of Nevada, when it convenes, itself to provide for enforcing the laws of the State. The State of Nevada must itself make a resolute effort in good faith to perform the police duties incident to the existence of a State.

Sincerely, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. JOHN SPARKS,
Governor of Nevada, Carson City, Nev.

(Report of Messrs. Murray, Neill, and Smith to the President.)

DECEMBER 30, 1907.

SIR: On December 11, 1907, you issued to us the following instructions:

"You are hereby directed to proceed immediately to Goldfield, Nev., and make an investigation at that place into the conditions existing there at this time, and you will, on your return to Washington, submit a report to me personally.

"All Federal officials, both civil and military, are hereby directed to render you any assistance that you may need and to give you access to any information, papers, or documents that they may have bearing on the situation."

In accordance therewith we left Washington on the afternoon of December 11, arriving at Goldfield Nev. in the evening of the 15th, and proceeded at once to make the investigation directed. We gave our entire time to this object, continuing hearings and interviews every day and usually until midnight, with the help of one, and later two, stenographers, until the morning of December 21, when we left Goldfield and returned to Washington.

Immediately upon our arrival in Goldfield we conferred with General Funston, who had been investigating the situation there for several days previous to our arrival and who remained for some days and assisted us in every way in our work. We next discussed the situation fully with the governor of the State, who was at Goldfield, and then met a committee from the miners' union and the executive committee of the Goldfield Mine Operators' Association. We thus obtained at the outset a comprehensive preliminary survey of the general situation.

The Mine Operators' Association, through their counsel, then presented to us a general statement of their side of the case, and, as they were the persons primarily desiring the coming and the retention of the troops, we informed them that we would regard this written statement as analogous to the plaintiff's complaint in a court action, and that we would at once call upon them to make out their case, and lay upon them the responsibility of producing as rapidly as possible the evidence therein, reserving to ourselves, of course, the right to hear thereafter evidence on the other side. They agreed to this procedure, which seemed to be the most practical way of handling the matter, and for several days brought before us numerous witnesses, documents, and other evidence intended to substantiate the allegations of their so-called "complaint" and demonstrate the need for Federal troops. Their counsel was informed that our primary object was to secure information bearing on the question as to what justification existed for the call for Federal troops and for their continuance at Goldfield, and, after several days of hearings, on December 20 he assured us that he had produced substantially the best evidence on his side of the case, that anything more he might bring would be simply cumulative, and, in substance, that he rested his case on what he had presented.

Inasmuch as we were by this time satisfied that the mine operators had not in any particular established a case justifying either the bringing or the retention of the troops, we did not deem it necessary to take any extensive evidence on the other side, and the hearing was substantially closed with a brief formal interview with the said committee from the miners' union.

THE QUESTION BEFORE THE COMMISSION.

The Federal troops had been sent to Goldfield on the request of the governor of Nevada, dated December 5, 1907, and we made it, therefore, the primary object of our work to ascertain, first, whether the state of facts existing in Goldfield prior to and at the arrival of the troops corresponded with the allegations of said request of the governor of Nevada, and gave sufficient ground for the sending of the troops, and, second, whether the conditions existing at Goldfield upon the arrival of the troops and up to and during the time of our stay there afforded a sufficient basis for their retention at that point, and if so, for what period they should be retained.

Incidentally, we necessarily informed ourselves briefly as to the merits of the industrial controversy there existing, but only so far as the same had some bearing on the question of law and order and the presence of the Federal troops. Any complete or satisfactory examination into the general merits of the industrial dispute would have covered many weeks and would have been impossible for us to make, having as we did no power to administer oaths or compel the attendance of witnesses or the production of evidence.

Inasmuch as the troops are still in Goldfield and the question of their retention there is an important issue, we deem it proper to submit to you herewith a report bearing on this question, and we therefore direct our findings in this report to a consideration of those facts which are relevant to this question in view of the requirements of section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution, sections 5297, 5298, and 5299 of the Revised Statutes, and the act of June 18, 1878, and to a consideration of the question as to what facts existed at Goldfield before and since the arrival of the troops to constitute the grounds of action described by the said article of the Constitution and the said statutory sections.

(Section 5299, Revised Statutes.)

INSURRECTION AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed.

(Section 5299, Revised Statutes.)

POWER TO SUPPRESS INSURRECTION IN VIOLATION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

Whenever insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations, or conspiracies in any State so obstructs or hinders the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, or immunities, or protection, named in the Constitution and secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, or immunities, and the constituted authorities of such State are unable to protect, or, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy, opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States, or the due execution thereof, or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary, for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations.

Revised Statute 5298 deals only with insurrections against the Government of the United States; Revised Statute 5299 deals only with violation of rights, privileges, immunities, or protection secured by the Constitution of the United States. These two sections may be therefore dismissed from consideration with the simple statement that there is absolutely no evidence showing the existence of any insurrection against the Government of the United States or the violation of any Federal rights.

Section 4, Article IV, of the Constitution provides as follows:

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of Government, shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened) against domestic violence."

Section 5297, Revised Statutes, based on the above constitutional provision, is as follows:

"In case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President, on application of the legislature of such State, or of the executive, when the legislature can not be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, which may be applied for, as he deems sufficient to suppress such insurrection; or, on like application, to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he deems necessary."

Act June 18, 1878, chapter 262, section 15:

"From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States, as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress; and no money appropriated by this act shall be used to pay any of the expenses incurred in the employment of any troops in violation of this section; and any person willfully violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years or by both such fine and imprisonment."

The said constitutional section and the said statute based thereon, together with said act of June 18, 1878, being clearly the only provisions of law possibly applicable in the premises, we took them as a guide for our investigation into the facts existing at Goldfield. It is true that the call of the governor of Nevada of December 5 was apparently based upon and followed largely the wording of section 5299, probably under a misapprehension of the force of that section. The attorney-general of the State informed us that he had been consulted in the preparation of the call and that it had been based upon section 5299. The governor stated in that call, however, that certain facts existed, which facts, if sufficiently verified, and if broad enough in their scope and important enough in their bearings, might conceivably furnish sufficient grounds for Federal action under section 5297, Revised Statutes, and although, as above set forth, it was obvious that the governor in framing the said request had before him especially section 5299, which was wholly inapplicable, nevertheless it was of course necessary to look rather at the substance than at the form of the request and to ascertain whether the facts so stated formed a basis of action under section 5297, Revised Statutes. The request of the governor was as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Nevada, ss.

To His Excellency Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, from Hon. John Sparks, Governor of the State of Nevada:

At Goldfield, Esmeralda County, State of Nevada, there does now exist domestic violence and unlawful combination and conspiracies, which do now so obstruct, and continue to obstruct and hinder, the execution of the laws of the State of Nevada, and now deprive, and continue to deprive, the people of said section of the State of the rights, privileges, immunities, and protection named in the Constitution of the United States, and of the State of Nevada, and which are secured by the laws for the protection of such rights, privileges, and immunities; and the constituted authorities of the State of Nevada are now, and continue to be, unable to protect the people in such rights; and the reason of such inability and the particulars thereof are the following, to wit:

Unlawful dynamiting of property; commission of felonies; threats against the lives and property of law-abiding citizens; the unlawful possession of arms and ammunition and the confiscation of dynamite, with threats of the unlawful use of the same by preconcerted action.

The lawfully constituted authorities of this State are unable to apprehend and punish the perpetrators of said crimes, and to prevent the commission of other threatened crimes, and unless the relief hereinafter requested is granted, this State, and the lives and property of a large number of its people, will be irreparably affected and damaged, contrary to the peace and dignity of the United States and of the State of Nevada.

Therefore, pursuant to article 4, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States, and to sections 5297 and 5299 of the Revised Statutes thereof, I, John Sparks, governor, do hereby respectfully request that Your Excellency Theodore Roosevelt, President, do immediately send to Goldfield, Esmeralda County, Nev., two companies of the troops of the Army of the United States, to suppress unlawful disorder and violence, to protect life and property, to restore peace, and to insure protection of law to the people of the State of Nevada.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed, at the capitol, Carson City, Nev., on this 5th day of December, A. D. 1907.

While the first part contains a number of allegations, they are general and formal in nature. The specific statements of fact contained in the call appear in the second paragraph.

FACTS AS TO SITUATION IN GOLDFIELD.

With these legal considerations in view, our findings are as follows:

There has exisited at Goldfield, which is exclusively a mining town of an estimated population of between 15,000 and 20,000 in South Nevada, for over a year past, and especially since the spring of 1907, a disturbed industrial situation, due to frequently recurring labor difficulties between the mine operators on the one hand and the miners on the other. The two sides were represented almost completely by the Goldfield Mine Operators' Association, including almost all the owners, operators, or lessees of mines on the one hand, and by the local union of the Western Federation of Miners on the other, a union comprising substantially all the miners in Goldfield. This union, known as Goldfield Miners' Union, No. 220, is a branch of the general organization known as the Western Federation of Miners. It has carried on its rolls a membership estimated at above 3,000 men, which number, however, included members of crafts in Goldfield other than workers in and about mines. Figures furnished us by the mine operators showed that about 1,900 mine workers went on strike on November 27, 1907. Although a number of strikes and minor difficulties had occurred during 1907, the only acute situation arising prior to the call for troops existed in the spring of 1907. This controversy involved not only a dispute between the mine owners and the miners at Goldfield, but also between members of the miners' union and the members of other crafts in Goldfield affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The Goldfield Miners' Union was also affiliated with the organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World, and an effort was made to force members of other crafts not affiliated with this organization to join its ranks. Not only the Mine Owners' Association and members of the miners' union went armed, but members of crafts not affiliated with the Industrial Workers of the World felt it necessary to carry arms to protect themselves while at their work. The condition of Goldfield at that time was that of an armed camp, and for a time a serious clash seemed imminent. The controversy resulted in a murder of a restaurant keeper and aroused such opposition against the Industrial Workers of the World that a ban was practically put upon them and the organization under that name was forced to abandon Goldfield. This acute situation disappeared before the end of the spring of 1907.

A succession of miners' strikes, however, had taken place throughout 1907, some of them with apparently little justification, and although the operators had yielded to nearly all the demands of the union, it seemed impossible to secure any settled industrial conditions. The mine operators insist that the socialistic doctrine adopted and preached by the Western Federation of Miners practically justified the stealing of ore by the miner. Some of the mines at Goldfield are among the richest in the world. They maintain, and of this there is little doubt, that this phenomenally rich ore is daily stolen to the amount of many hundreds of dollars by some of the miners, and that the representatives of the union have resisted and attempted to nullify reasonable attempts on the part of the mine owners to protect themselves against these thefts by "change rooms," or otherwise.

The industrial situation was further aggravated by the fact that the Goldfield union would not enter into any contract governing working conditions for any specified length of time, and the mine operators therefore could have no assurance at any time that any settlement of a dispute was more than a temporary makeshift, nor could they secure any assurance of stable industrial conditions for any fixed length of time.

Moreover, the Goldfield Miners' Union embraces in one single union not only the various crafts working in and about the mines, but also clerks, waiters, bartenders, and other miscellaneous crafts and avocations in Goldfield.

On November 27, 1907, a strike of the miners was inaugurated and is still in effect. This strike grew out of a refusal on the part of the miners to accept cashiers' checks in payment of their wages. The miners insisted upon some form of guaranty by the mine operators of whatever paper was accepted in lieu of cash. Various propositions were made, but no basis of agreement was reached.

The merits of this controversy are not of importance here, as we are concerned solely with the question of whether or not conditions warranted the calling for Federal troops. The mine operators insist that the attitude of the miners in refusing to accept cashiers' checks in payment of wages in the then acute currency condition of the country was unjustifiable, and that this as a culmination to their past experience exhausted their patience and definitely determined them to make a final break with the Western Federation of Miners and establish their permanent independence of that organization. The miners contend that their demand for a guaranty of the scrip of the mine operators was entirely proper and just, and that the mine operators sought a strike as a means to secure Federal troops, and then reduce wages and destroy the union in Goldfield.

The action of the mine operators warrants the belief that they had determined upon a reduction in wages and the refusal of employment to members of the Western Federation of Miners, but that they feared to take this course of action unless they had the protection of Federal troops, and that they accordingly laid a plan to secure such troops, and then put their programme into effect.

A committee of the mine operators went to see the governor on December 2, and urged upon him the necessity of calling for the Federal troops to preserve peace and order in Goldfield. An agreement seems to have been reached that if conditions continued as they then were that the governor would issue such call, and the committee returned after having agreed with the governor upon a code word which should be sent by telegraph to indicate the necessity for troops still existed.

Some days later the agreed-upon word was telegraphed to the governor, and he thereupon issued his call upon the President for troops. During this time, when conditions at Goldfield were represented to be in such lawless state as to demand Federal troops, there was apparently no discussion of the subject whatever carried on outside of the Mine Operators' Association. No indication was permitted to become public as to the real purpose of the call of the committee on the governor.

The papers published the fact of the presence of the committee from Goldfield at Reno, and stated the purpose of its visit to be the selection of a site for a smelter. After the agreement with the governor, and pending the sending of the telegraphic word agreed upon, no public intimation was given in Goldfield that troops had been asked for or were expected. Neither the county commissioners, the sheriff, nor the district attorney were consulted, nor had any one of them even a suspicion of the action which had been taken. The first news that the city had that it was in a condition of lawlessness and disorder, requiring the intervention of the Federal Government, was when dispatches appeared in the papers that the troops had been called for and were then on their way to Goldfield. When the fact was ascertained positively that the troops were actually on their way to Goldfield, a formal protest was telegraphed to the governor by most of the county officers.

The troops arrived in Goldfield on December 6. On December 7 the Goldfield Mine Operators' Association issued a public statement in which, among other things, they said, "We propose to adopt fair and reasonable rules for the operation of our properties and employ men irrespective of whether they belong to unions." The rules and regulations adopted, in pursuance of this statement, made a general reduction in their wage scale, amounting, in the case of miners, from $5 to $4 per day, and also provided that the said association would not employ any man belonging to Goldfield Miners' Union, No. 220, of the Western Federation of Miners, or any other union in Goldfield or elsewhere that is connected or affiliated with the Western Federation of Miners, and, in pursuance of this provision, stated that—

"Each employee of a member of this association shall, as a condition of employment, be required to sign the following agreement:

"'In consideration of my being employed by the ——— ——— company for such time as my services shall be satisfactory and at the wages heretofore fixed by said company, subject to the rules and regulations fixed by said company and by the Goldfield Mine Operators' Association relating to the employment of men in and around mines of Goldfield mining district, I hereby covenant and agree with said company that I am not now, and will not be during the time I am working for said company, a member of Goldfield Miners' Union, No. 220, of the Western Federation of Miners, or of any other union in Goldfield or elsewhere that is directly or indirectly affiliated with or has any connection of any kind, nature, or description with said The Western Federation of Miners.

"'Witness my hand and seal at Goldfield, Esmeralda County, Nev., this ——— day of ———, 190—.'"

While this cut in wages and refusal to employ members of the Western Federation of Miners was not announced until after the arrival of troops, every indication confirms the belief that such action was in contemplation before the arrival of troops, was part of the general plan of the mine operators to establish their independence of the union, and that the coming of the troops was expected and urged by them to make such plan fesible.

We find that from the spring of 1907 to the date of the arrival of the troops there were no conditions of especial violence or disorder in Goldfield, or particular reasons why such disorder was likely to occur. Apart from the question of the personnel of the miners' union—a matter that will be discussed later—the situation was normal. The town had been for at least six months previous fully as free from disturbances as any mining town of similar situation and conditions. There had been no organized opposition to law. The number of homicides during the two years prior to the coming of the troops, as stated by the county officials, did not exceed a half a dozen, and several of these had no relation to any labor difficulties. There was evidence that in the past two years a number of so-called "deportations" had taken place; that is, men had been driven out by union sympathizers either by threats or by actual violence, but probably the total number so forced out of town did not exceed twenty-five in two years. There were made before us, it is true, several statements of very much larger number, going as high as 700, but when all the witnesses had been asked to give names and facts in specific cases the number of such cases brought to our attention did not exceed twenty. Moreover, numbers of these deportations were not in furtherance of any organized plan to drive out nonunion men. They represented the paying off of old scores due to former troubles in Cripple Creek and the Coeur d'Alenes.

There was no evidence of the unlawful use of dynamite, with the one exception that it was shown that one of the poles of the electric power company's plant had been bored and dynamite cartridges inserted and lighted (which, however, failed to explode), and that a large number of other cartridges had been left at the base of the pole. No actual damage was done. This occurred shortly before the arrival of the troops. It is alleged by the miners' union that this had been done by the mine operators themselves in order to produce the appearance of violence, and while we express no opinion as to who placed the dynamite there, it must be admitted that the circumstances in the case and the clumsy way in which the work was done at least raises a reasonable doubt as to the genuineness of the attempt. We find that there were at the time of the troops' arrival a considerable number of rifles in the possession of each party; that a large number of men in the town were carrying pistols, but probably not in much greater proportion than is true of most mining towns of this character. In short, up to the time the troops arrived, and for six months prior thereto, there had been no unusual conditions of violence or disorder or any such conditions as would in any way justify the presence of the Federal troops or their retention there. The conditions did not support the general allegations in the governor's request for troops, nor were his specific statements established to any such extent as to justify his use of these statements for the purpose of getting Federal troops.

The great bulk of the testimony submitted by the mine operators set forth facts which tended to show, not the existence of actual serious disorder in the past or in the present, but the possibilities of future disorders should the troops be withdrawn. It was this potential situation that was obviously in the minds of most of the men who appeared before us on behalf of the retention of the troops. Many men of almost all classes, whose assertions we believe to have been perfectly sincere, stated earnestly that they believed that should the troops be withdrawn there would very shortly arise a condition of serious disorder and violence, loss of life and damage to property, taking the shape of a direct conflict between the miners' union and the mine operators. Inasmuch as the situation, as above stated, had remained substantially unchanged for the six months prior to the coming of the troops, during which time practically no one believed in the probability of an insurrection or serious disorder, and inasmuch as on December 5 the so-called "insurrection" was unknown to the community and the coming of the troops a complete surprise, it was obvious that some new factors must have entered the situation very recently in order to produce these honest opinions as to future disorder.

We find that such new factors did enter, but after the troops arrived, and that they consisted of the announced determination aforesaid on the part of the mine operators, on December 7, to reduce wages and to refuse employment to members of the Western Federation; that this programme, if carried out, meant a struggle for its existence on the part of the union, and that these witnesses naturally felt that this struggle would, on the withdrawal of the troops, take the form of serious disorder. This explains to our minds the acuteness of the new situation that arose, the fears of many of those who appeared before us, and the desire expressed by so many that the troops should be retained.

Probably the most disturbing of the new factors was the refusal by the operators to employ members of the Western Federation, as above set forth, and this particular requirement, in our own opinion, was on its face contrary to the statute of Nevada, as follows:

"CHAP. CXI. An Act making it unlawful for employers to enter into agreements with their employees or persons about to enter their employment not to become or continue as members of labor organizations and prescribing penalties for violation thereof. (Approved March 17, 1903.)

"The people of the State of Nevada, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

"SECTION 1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to make or enter into any agreement, either oral or in writing, by the terms of which any employee of such person, firm, or corporation, or any person about to enter the employ of such person, firm, or corporation, as a condition for continuing or obtaining such employment, shall promise or agree not to become or continue a member of a labor organization, or shall promise or agree to become or continue a member of a labor organization.

"SEC. 2. Any person or persons, firm or firms, corporation or corporations violating the provisions of section 1 of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not less than $50 or more than $300, or be imprisoned in the county jail for a period of not less than twenty-five days or more than five months, or both such fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 3. All acts or parts of acts in conflict with the above are hereby repealed."

The constitutionality of this statute, as well as its application, was questioned by the mine operators, but, of course, until it has been declared unconstitutional by judicial decision it must be regarded as the law of that State.

The question as to possible future violence and disorder on the withdrawal of the troops we find to depend largely on the personnel of the miners' union, and their leaders in particular. A number of these leaders are represented to be men of radical socialistic beliefs and in favor of forcibly asserting what they hold to be their rights. Goldfield, being one of the newest and richest gold-mining camps of the West, attracted many of the most adventurous and radical characters in the miners' union, and while many of these have recently left, it is believed that there remain a considerable number of men whose records in other mining camps presage ill for the future of law and order in Goldfield if Federal troops are withdrawn.

It was strongly urged that the experience of other mining camps with the Western Federation of Miners gave good grounds for the belief that should the mine operators insist on maintaining their position, as above stated, serious disorder would be likely to ensue immediately upon the withdrawal of the troops. All this, however, is purely a matter of future possibilities and not of actual present or past disorders in Goldfield. From the almost unanimous consensus of opinion of all witnesses we are satisfied that in the entire miners' union of Goldfield there are not over a few hundred men of a dangerous type—men who would readily resort to violence to accomplish their ends. The great majority, probably over three-fourths of the union, while loyal to their organization, were conceded to be men of law-abiding tendency, who would not willingly initiate or support deliberate violence. But there is likewise little doubt but that this large proportion of orderly men have in the past permitted themselves and their organization to be dominated and controlled in its public actions by vicious leaders, and have lacked either the coherence or the courage to suppress this element and conduct the affairs of their organization in a way to command public respect and confidence. In the early part of the present year the miners' union of Goldfield permitted a celebration to be held by the union and a procession under its auspices to march through the streets of that city carrying the red flag of anarchy as a sole emblem and bearing aloft legends and mottoes of an incendiary character. It is claimed that but a small proportion of the miners' union took part in the procession, but it had received the official sanction of the union, and, so far as is publicly known, was never repudiated by that body. Their personal good character can not excuse members of the Goldfield union for permitting their leaders to outrage decent sentiment, and can not save the organization to which they belong from bearing the reputation it has earned. By permitting their organization to be managed and controlled by men of violent tendencies, the union as a body has thus laid itself open to the reproach of being a vicious organization, and has furnished a foundation for the fear existing in Goldfield that it will support violence and disorder to win its present strike.

In view of the foregoing facts, we believe there is considerable danger that serious disorders will be attempted if the troops be withdrawn and the mine operators insist on carrying out their publicly announced policy. But if a handful of men have controlled the Goldfield Miners' Union and committed the organization to indefensible policies and practices, it is no reason why the county of Esmeralda and the State of Nevada should tamely submit to the domination of this same group and should not assert their authority and power and enforce respect for law and order without support of Federal troops.

ATTITUDE OF THE CIVIL AUTHORITIES.

The foregoing are the essential facts as to the elements of order and disorder existing in Goldfield. Taking up now the conditions relating to the civil authorities there:

Nevada has no State militia, its former force having been disbanded. The only force at the disposal of the governor consists of five State detectives, substantially all of whom are acting now as mine guards in Goldfield and in the pay of the mine operators, a force wholly inadequate to deal with any serious disorder. The governor informed us in writing that he would not convene the legislature, and that he would not take any steps to organize a State militia under the State statutes; that in case the troops should be withdrawn he did not know what he would do, but so far as he could then see he would do nothing. The exact form of this statement was as follows:

INTERVIEW WITH GOVERNOR JOHN SPARKS, OF NEVADA, AT HOTEL CASEY, GOLDFIELD, NEV., DECEMBER 17, 1907.

Present: Messrs. Smith, Murray, and Neill.

Mr. SMITH. We want to get in permanent and definite shape your decisions on the questions we talked of this afternoon. First, whether you will or will not convene the legislature.—A. I do not think that I can consistently do it.

Q. So you decline to do that—A. For the present; yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. SMITH. As to another matter, Governor, there was suggested the appointment of a militia here?—A. Yes.

Q. What is your view on that?—A. Well, it would take considerable time to organize that. You mean a State militia?

Q. Yes, sir.—A. Well, I should oppose that. I have opposed it all the way along. The very people I am trying to protect knew that the soldiers were here and backed me up on that. I believe a State militia at this time would be disgraceful to the State.

Q. What I refer to especially is an emergency militia, which was suggested this afternoon right in this town.—A. An emergency militia? If we had the right kind of an emergency militia it would operate all right; but I don't believe we could get that kind. That is one of the circumstances.

Q. So just what would be your action in case the troops are withdrawn?—A. Well, Mr. Smith, I have got to consider your proposition. I don't want to dodge any question you ask me, but at the present time I do not know what I would do. The chances are I would not do anything until these people here fought it out on common ground with one another. It seems they are prepared to do it. I don't want them to do it. I want to preserve peace, law, and order and protect the people more than property.

Mr. MURRAY. Governor, at the present time you do not feel justified, then, in having the legislature in extraordinary session nor to organize a State militia?—A. No, sir; I don't think it would be wise to do it. A State militia would not remedy the situation, in my judgment.

December 18, 1907.

This is a correct copy and statement.

In brief, the attitude of the State was simply passive. The governor had in conference with him at the time his aid, Captain Cox, and the attorney-general, Mr. Stoddard, and after this interview, December 18, he left Goldfield and did not return during our stay.

We had conferences with the sheriff of the county, two of the three county commissioners, two of the assemblymen, and the district attorney, constituting all the representatives of the civil authorities of the county whose presence we could secure. Goldfield is not an incorporated city. There is a constable, but it appears, so far as we could ascertain, that since the removal of the county seat to Goldfield his powers have been largely superseded by those of the sheriff and that substantially the sheriff is the supreme and responsible peace officer of the county and the town. Our interview with these gentlemen was unsatisfactory in the extreme, lasting nearly ten hours continuously and until 10 o'clock of the night of December 19. We endeavored to get from them a statement, and especially from the sheriff, as to whether in their opinion the county officers could or could not maintain order in Goldfield should the troops be withdrawn. They each evaded this question to the utmost limit and in such a way that it was perfectly obvious that they did not dare to answer it directly, until at the end of our interview, when we finally secured from them all, as the most direct definite statement they would make in answer to our single question on this point, the following negation:

"Sheriff Ingalls, are you willing to say that if the troops are removed from here you can not maintain law and order in this town and protect life and property? Are you willing to say that?

"No; I can not say that."

The same question was put to all the said county officers and the same answer was received. They all stated that they resented the call of troops by the governor; that their coming was unnecessary, but that now the troops were in Goldfield they wished that they might be kept there. They insisted that it was an insult to the citizens and officials of Goldfield to have brought in Federal troops to maintain order and that it conveyed an utterly false impression to the outside public, but they did not recognize that the continuance of the troops after their having once arrived was a daily repetition and accentuation of what they regarded as originally an insult. They would, however, absolutely accept no responsibility whatsoever for the retention of the troops, and, while desiring their presence in order to keep the peace for which these officials were themselves responsible, it was their clear intention to get the benefit thereof and at the same time throw the whole responsibility for the continued presence of the troops upon the President.

The county derives a large income from the bullion tax, and the county commissioners boasted to us of their ability to make extensive improvements and pay for them quickly. The sheriff has complete power to summon every able-bodied man in the community as a member of his posse for the purpose of keeping the peace.

We are satisfied that the county officials have full power and authority to keep the peace in that county; that there are many law-abiding citizens who could be employed by the sheriff in case of emergency, and who would make a completely effective force for the enforcement of order.

Thus not only the State, but the county authorities deliberately, and in writing, refused to assume any other than a passive attitude in this matter.

There is absolutely no question that if the State of Nevada and the county of Esmeralda exercise the powers at their disposal they can maintain satisfactory order in Goldfield; that so far these authorities have done nothing, but are relying upon Federal aid, and their attitude now is expressly that of refusing to do anything and desiring to throw their own burdens upon the Federal Government for the maintenance of those elementary conditions of order for which they, and they only, are responsible.

CONSIDERATION OF THE LEGAL PRINCIPLES APPLICABLE.

The entire foregoing states the facts in the situation, the powers of the several authorities of Nevada and of the county and their attitude toward their own duty. We are satisfied that the findings that we have stated are correct, and that they are fully sufficient for the determination of the action of the Federal Government in this case.

Being especially cognizant of these facts, we believe it proper for us now to suggest their relation to the general principles of law and the Constitution which are applicable thereto. While the Constitution, section 4 of Article IV, and Revised Statutes, 5297, provide that in certain contingencies the Federal Government shall assist in maintaining order in a State, it is clear that such action must be strictly limited. (Such action is further limited by the act of June 18, 1878.) When a community assumes the condition of statehood as a member of the Union of the United States, and secures the great rights and privileges consequent thereupon, it also assumes certain great obligations and duties of which it can not divest itself, and if these duties are not performed, or if an honest, reasonable attempt be not made to perform them, the members of that community must suffer the consequences of such failure and can not be relieved therefrom by appealing to any other power. Desirable as it is that civil order be maintained, much as we may deprecate the loss of life and property which may yet occur at Goldfield, far greater evils would arise should these fundamental principles be set aside and any State be allowed to relieve itself of those elemental responsibilities which they have assumed by the mere fact of becoming a State. The Constitution does indeed provide that the United States shall protect the States against domestic violence, but the meaning of this provision has been well set forth in Revised Statutes, 5297, based thereon, which practically defines domestic violence for such purposes as insurrection. It is obvious that the domestic violence referred to must mean violence which a State can not control by reasonable exercise of the powers at its disposal. Any broader construction of this clause would mean that the State might at any time call upon the Federal Government for assistance in mere police duty, in the suppression of street brawls, and ordinary breaches of peace, such as occur constantly in every State of the Union, and might thus, through the connivance of the executive and the legislature of a given State, relieve that State of all of its responsibilities and expenses for the maintenance of ordinary daily order, throw the same upon the Federal Government, and relieve the State and every subdivision thereof of its most fundamental and constant obligation, and furthermore destroy that very principle of a dual government, central and local, upon which our entire political system is based.

In the case in question we find that, to put it tersely, the State of Nevada, with a population of about 70,000, and the city of Goldfield, with a population of probably 15,000, are thus far in the position of deliberately and expressly abdicating their governmental powers in the face of not more than a few hundred dangerous and disorderly men and of calling upon the Federal Government to perform the work of keeping these men in order by the use of Federal troops. We believe that such a condition illustrates to the extreme the false principles above condemned and that it would be a precedent of infinitely evil possibilities should the Federal Government concur in any such position as the governor of Nevada and the officials of Esmeralda County desire it to take.

The above considerations apply to the fundamental question as to whether the troops should be indefinitely maintained in Goldfield, as is desired by many citizens there, and we believe that these considerations answer that question emphatically in the negative. Since we left Goldfield, however, and on December 31, the governor of Nevada has changed the decision he expressed to us and has issued a call convening the legislature of that State for January 14, 1908. We believe it proper and expedient, inasmuch as the troops are now in Goldfield at the request of the governor, that the troops should remain there until the assembling of the legislature, to preserve the statu quo, so that the legislature may deal with the situation as it now exists. But we also most firmly believe that upon the assembling of the legislature, or within a few days thereafter, the troops should be removed, regardless of any request for their retention that may be made by either the legislature or the governor of Nevada, it being essential that the State of Nevada shall understand this situation completely, shall recognize the fact that there will, at that date, be thrown upon it, and it alone, the primary responsibility of keeping order, and that, recognizing this responsibility, it may take such action as is the duty of the State and as will be sufficient in the premises.

CARSON, NEV., January 17, 1908.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

The resolution following has been adopted by both houses of the Nevada legislature to-day without a dissenting vote. We earnestly urge you to carefully consider the same. We are now working on a constabulary law, and will keep you advised of progress:

"Resolved by the senate of the State of Nevada (the assembly concurring), That whereas conditions exist in the State of Nevada that border upon and threaten an immediate state of domestic violence; and

"Whereas said State of Nevada has no State militia or other adequate police force at its disposal sufficient to protect its inhabitants against domestic violence: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That application is hereby made by the legislature of Nevada to the President of the United States to retain in the Goldfield mining district of Nevada a sufficient force of the United States Army to protect said State against domestic violence and to insure to the inhabitants of that community and the State domestic tranquillity, the preservation of law and order, and the observance of the laws of the United States and the State of Nevada, and that such portion of the United States Army be maintained in said district until the State of Nevada, through its legislature, now in extraordinary session assembled, shall be able to provide by law for the organization and equipment of a State constabulary or other police force sufficient to maintain law and order and suppress any domestic violence that may occur."

(The President to Governor Sparks.)

[Telegram.]

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 17, 1908.

Hon. JOHN SPARKS,
Governor of Nevada, Carson City, Nev.:

In response to your telegram transmitting the resolution of the legislature of Nevada, I authorize you to inform the legislature that in accordance with its request I will permit the troops to remain in Nevada for such reasonable length of time as will give opportunity to the legislature to organize such police force as will enable the State authorities to perform the police functions of the State. I assume, of course, that there will be all possible expedition in providing this police force.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

(Governor Sparks to the President.)

CARSON, NEV., January 29, 1908.

The PRESIDENT, Washington:

Our State police bill passed both houses of the Nevada legislature by a large majority and is now a law. We are working to organize the force as fast as possible.

JOHN SPARKS, Governor of Nevada.

THE THIRD POWER—THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY.

I shall now for a short time direct my attention to the third power, the most potent of all these mighty powers, established and ordained, it would appear, largely for the benefit of property. I refer to the courts, and more particularly to the Federal courts. I do not mean to unduly censure the courts. They are as good as the power that made and sustains them, and it was ordained more than one hundred years ago by the fathers, who wrought as well as the light they had would permit, and that power yet exists in all its original strength.

It is in defense of the freedom of contract that the courts have erected about property a bulwark of defense. Let me remind you, gentlemen, that the freedom of contract when the Constitution was framed in 1787 and the freedom of contract to-day are not one and the same. The great industrial change, which no human mind could then anticipate and which is now an insurmountable fact, has placed the workingman at the greatest disadvantage in seeking to sell or barter his labor. It would require a most cunning sophistry and crafty logic to convince any fair-minded man that the laborer selling his toil to a corporation, which has practically a monopoly over a large part of the country, enjoys the same benefits derived from the freedom of contract as was enjoyed in the early part of the last century and up to the last quarter of it, when the workingman sold his labor in a market to many small competitive employers, uninfluenced by the power and greed of monopoly.

However, the Federal judiciary, at the beginning, was the ne plus ultra of power, and so it is to-day. Its affirmations of law are, as in the days of the Medes and the Persians, thought to be proof against the eternal and God-made law—the only true law, and which is always an evolution, out of the spiritual forces which are everywhere, whether in the realm of physics, of economics, of judicial opinion, or of religion. Changes are being wrought everywhere, in every department of thought, for the upward build and elevation of mankind, except in the Federal judiciary.

These courts are the only invention of man that seem to be impervious to the benign influence of the march of time. Like beavers do they work in the very teeth of this programme, announced and published to all men two thousand years ago on the shores of Galilee. This programme was intended to make all men brothers, and this consummation is from the eternal, and shall come to pass, whether they be rich or poor, high or low, or of whatever repute. They are the same flesh and blood and are by nature brothers, and they must live together like brothers or perish from off the face of the earth.

I criticise these courts for the reason that they seem deliberately to ignore the trend of the times, and in their proceedings lose sight of the controversy and stick in the bark and ignore the spirit, preferring to live on worn-out precedents rather than to enlarge their opinions with the divine ideals abroad in the land, which are everywhere working for the betterment of society. This hard and fast rule, although they call it equity, is invoked when passing on human rights and liberties, the same as if they were passing upon the value of a bale of cotton or a fur hat or any other article of commerce, and they assert in defense of this merciless method, that precendent, man-made, handcuffs and leads them onward, but, I am sorry to say, not upward, in this cruel process.

On a recent occasion Mr. Justice Brewer, a great judge and a Christian gentleman, after talking very beautifully about justice, concluded in this language:

The inevitable failure of justice in this world is a sure sign of a future life.

I suppose he means that the poor devil who starves here will get justice in heaven. And he continues:

In that next world environment and heredity will be rightly and justly considered.

Thus it is that I say all justice and judicial authorities should act with the consciousness of a Supreme Being who is above us, and who will make perfect all the failures of human life.

But I would ask: What good does all this do the man and his children and his wife who are cold and hungry? Referring to mercy as it is considered in human courts, Justice Brewer said:

Mercy and justice are handmaids of Providence, but in this world of ours mercy is not a judicial function. To consider it in the courts would be to establish a precedent. Mercy is seen only in the pardons granted by executive authority, but that is not a judicial function.

What a confession of weakness!

Hear this same judge from the stump. I ask in all seriousness if silence would not be more becoming in this sage of the law? But hear him anyway:

There is a disposition to-day to tie the hands of the judge and restrict judicial action. This is shown by legislation, particularly in the Western States, forbidding the judge to refer in his charge to the fact requiring him to instruct in writing and otherwise limiting the freedom of his action.

The purpose is to guard against injustice resulting from the unwise action of prejudiced judges and to prevent any dispute concerning what took place at the trial. And yet the effect of it is to turn the judge into something little better than a moderator of a town meeting, with no efficient voice in the determination of a litigation.

Far better would it be to take more pains in the selection of competent and experienced judges, and then give them a free hand in the trial. This appears also in Congressional legislation giving to administrative officers exclusive determination in regard to immigrants, the seizure and removal of Chinese, and other prohibited classes. Again, it is disclosed by the clamor against the exercise of the equitable power of injunction. Effort has been made to make this a political question.

Government by injunction has been an object of easy denunciation. So far from removing or restricting this power, there never was a time when its unrestricted and vigorous exercise was worth more to the nation and for the best interests of all.

As population becomes more dense, as business interests multiply and crowd each other, the restraining power of a court of equity is of far greater importance than the punishing power of a court of criminal law.

To take away the equitable power of restraining wrong is a step backward toward barbarism rather than forward toward a higher civilization.

Is he not drunk with power? Read it and question yourself as to the propriety of a judge, who may be called upon to pass upon the legislation that he anticipates, to censure legislation pending in and to be passed by a coordinate branch of the Government in response to a strong public demand. When judges become this bold and audacious, their powers need to be shorn, rather than enlarged—it matters not whether he be a supreme judge of the United States, or a justice of the peace. The people need to lay their hands upon his lofty brow and say:

Cæsar, we know that you have been fed on power until you are big with your own greatness, yet you are only our servant; and if we can't get at you now, we will, some of these days, change things so we can.

GOVERNMENT BY THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY.

It has long been the belief of the ablest statesmen of this country that the Federal judiciary would, in time, become the most perfect oligarchy the world has ever seen, and why not? And, I desire to add, it will be because of the system and not because of the judges, who usually have been good and honest men. But, is a man, because he sits on the woolsack, spiritualized? And is he, consequently, one to whom is intrusted the whole counsel of truth? Is he immune to his environments? Has the taint of original sin been removed? Where has his heritage and education gone? Are all transformed into the glory of the brightness of infallibility? And yet, this is the theory of all property worshipers. It is a living untruth. We all know it and history will prove it. The Sanhedrin of Judea claimed to have derived its origin from the hand of Jehovah amid the thunders of Sinai and yet the Saviour of mankind denounced the Sanhedrin bitterly, and it in turn killed him. His indignation was kindled into a flame of righteous wrath and the twenty-second and twenty-third chapters of St. Matthew contain the most withering and severe denouncement of intellectual pride and self-righteousness that was ever uttered. They are philippics for all time against the "holier-than-thou" man. I commend these chapters to the other side of this House.

It is unbecoming in any freeman to worship any man-made tribunal, however much he may esteem and honor it, and with sycophantic adulation, because of self-interest, avow the infallibility of any man's judgment, whether he is on the bench, in the study, on the highway, or in the pulpit, nor do I believe that good government demands of its citizens a stultification of the truth, even in the interest of the courts. The men of the fifties did not hesitate to express themselves, and not always in good parliamentary language, concerning the courts that were intent upon fastening slavery on one-half of the country, right or wrong.

RECENT DECISIONS AFFECTING LABOR UNIONS.

The following are some of the opinions by Federal judges, wherein injunctions were issued to prevent trade and labor unions from exercising whatever influence they or their members might have by way of argument, talk and literature, to induce nonunion men from taking sides against them with their industrial enemies to defeat them in obtaining better labor conditions from their employers, or masters, in the field of industry:

SACRED RIGHTS THREATENED.

I shall not offer any analysis of these cases, but do assert that organized labor is by them made halt and lame and will remain but a shadow, for these and other like cases, as precedents, in the hands of an able judiciary bent upon upbuilding the sacredness of property, regardless of the sacredness of human rights and bread and clothes and shelter for the poor, constitute a whole arsenal of weapons for the work to be done. Coming events cast their shadows before them. To-morrow may be seen in to-day. That the liberty of the press and the freedom of free speech are threatened by the trend of such decisions there can be no question.

[a] See Judge Caldwell's strong dissenting opinion in this case.

Many of these opinions are by a bare majority of the court and the dissents are often very vigorous. This calls to my mind a short poem, which is appropriate:

FIVE TO FOUR.

The shades of night were falling free
When up from Washington, D. C.,
There come decrees, all handed down
By judges wrapped in black silk gown—
"Five to four."

The income tax? They pondered late
And argufied with learning great;
They seized their pens and gravely wrote—
Opinions—then they took the vote—
"Five to four."

The merger? 'Twas a famous case.
Each judge sat there with solemn face
And heard the arguments so keen;
When the decision came 'twas seen—
"Five to four."

Our wards beyond the deep blue sea?
Ah, surely here they will agree!
But after rods of legal lore
Behold the spectacle once more—
"Five to four."

A law to safeguard human life,
To care for orphans and for wife;
Ah, judges on that will agree!
But there's the record—look and see—
"Five to four."

Other decisions of the very greatest importance which have been recently delivered by the court will, by the rhymster, be put into song, showing the same harmony of judicial wisdom. How many decisions involving the construction of the Constitution and statutes affecting labor organizations and the right of laborers in actions for damages have been unanimous and without vigorous dissents? How can the people have the greatest respect for this court when it is divided against itself and not always uses the most judicial language in disclosing to the world its divided views on subjects that many believe involve the perpetuity of the nation? Mr. Lincoln often quoted Scripture when dealing with great questions, and this was one of his favorite passages: "Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation, and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand." What think you of this divine statement? How stands the Supreme Court of the United States—the empire builder—the whole fabric of government thus made at times to hang upon one man's judgment—for it is frequently five to four, as we have seen? Does it not show the very essence of fallibility, of weakness, And if it is the best we can do—and I will not dispute it—let us be sensible and honest with ourselves and speak out when necessary.

What astonishes me most is that this powerful tribunal, in the first decade of the twentieth century, like many similar ones before it, seems to be possessed of unshakable confidence in its wisdom and ability to guide the destinies of the greatest Republic in all history successfully and to the highest goal. But history tells of many such no doubt innocent but self-sufficient tribunals. Most of them have passed away. And, like the tribunal of wise men summoned by King Ahasueras, like the Jewish Sanhedrin, the Areopagus of Athens, and others, they have existed and wrought, never doubting, as far as history informs us, and without the least trepidation, they pronounced oracles of every kind of law with all the confidence of absolute right and truth.

Listen to that great commoner, Abraham Lincoln, that "second man of sorrows," as he has been designated by a gentleman on this floor:

Speaking of the Dred Scott decision, he says:

It was by a divided court—dividing differently on the different points. * * * Judge Douglas does not discuss the merits of the decision. * * * He denounces all who question the correctness of that decision as offering violent resistance to it. * * * We think the decision is erroneous—wrong. * * * We know the court that made it has often overruled its own decisions, and we shall do what we can to have this overruled. We offer no resistance to it.

"YOU WORK AND I'LL EAT."

Lincoln kept in view the real issue that the decision was wrong, and hear him. This is the issue:

It is the eternal struggle between these two principles—right and wrong—throughout the world. They are the two principles that have stood face to face from the beginning of time; and will ever continue to struggle. The one is the common right of humanity and the other the divine right of kings. It is the same principle in whatever shape it develops itself. It is the same spirit that says, "You work and toil and earn bread, and I'll eat it." No matter in what shape it comes, whether from the mouth of a king who seeks to bestride the people of his own nation and live by the fruit of their labor, or from one race of men as an apology for enslaving another race, it is the same tyrannical principle.

I now quote from Mr. Jefferson to show how dangerous he considered the powers of the Federal judiciary. He said, in a letter written to Mr. Thomas Ritchie, from Monticello, in 1820:

The judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working underground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric. They are construing our Constitution from a coordination of a general and special government to a general and supreme one alone. This will lay all things at their feet, and they are too well-versed in the English law to forget the maxim. "boni judicis ampliare jurisdictionem."

On the same question, in a subsequent letter to Judge Spencer Roane, also written from Monticello in 1821, he said:

The great object of my fear is the Federal judiciary. That body, like gravity, ever acting with noiseless foot and alarming advance, gaining ground step by step and holding what it gains, is engulfing insidiously the special governments into the jaws of that which feeds them.

Apropos, and in line with these comments by Lincoln and Jefferson, on the danger of clothing the courts or the judiciary with powers of sovereignty, Mr. Gardiner, in his great history of England, says with respect to fixing the boundaries of the constitution of England:

Bacon's dislike of admitting the judges to be the supreme arbiters on political and administrative questions arose originally from his profound conviction that such questions could only be properly treated of by those who were possessed of political knowledge and administrative experience. He felt, truly enough, that the most intimate acquaintance with statutes and precedents was insufficient to enable a man to decide upon state affairs; and if he had ever been inclined to forget it, the example of Coke was constantly before his eyes as proof that no amount of legal knowledge will ever constitute a statesman. Nor was this a consideration of small importance. As the relations between James and his Parliament then stood, the judge who decided upon the law which assigned limits to each could not avoid usurping the functions of a statesman. He not only declared how far the existing law applied to the facts of the case, but he fixed the constitution of the country for the future. It was true that the decisions of the judges were liable at any time to be reversed by act of Parliament; but the day was far distant when it would be possible to obtain the joint assent of the Crown and the Parliament to any act affecting the powers of either. For the present, the judges, if they succeeded in maintaining their independence, would have in their hands the supreme control over the Constitution. They would be able, without rendering an account to anyone, to restrain or to extend the powers of the Crown for an indefinite period. In 1606 they had, by a decision from the bench, assigned to the King the right of levying impositions, which, in spite of all opposition, he retained for no less than thirty-five years.

POWER TOO FAR FROM PEOPLE.

This master intellect did not believe in making the judiciary of any government the final depository of power so far removed from the people. Similar observations from the ablest minds of the world are easy of access to anyone who desires to be informed on this greatest of all constitutional questions, and it is one preeminently for the statesman, as was said by Bacon, Jefferson, Lincoln, and others, rather than for the lawyer learned in statutes and precedents. The great Bacon well understood the workings of the human mind, when unshackled by limitations, whether great or small, learned or unlearned, and knew that it was a dangerous agent, and when made secure its work in any line of thought or conduct, unless checked, would certainly go to dangerous extremes. I understand the form of our Government and that what I am now saying is, for immediate results, fruitless, but I am like others who are upon the walls as sentinels proclaiming what seems to be the truth and what must come to pass. We have had one example—years of the bloodiest internecine war in all history.

Revolutions often are necessary to undo the work of such unhampered power. Such revolutions are well known to the student of history, and it is well, ever and anon, to warn this great coordinate branch of our Government and admonish it that the legislative branch, which touches every sort of public life and is leavened by the best impulses of the age, is jealous of the people's welfare, the proletariat included, and that it is vigilantly watching the labor of this colossus of might and wisdom, which ever have a political and economic bearing.

Is our Constitution so materialistic in genius and construction as to admit only of decisions that make it more difficult every year for the toilers of every class, who bear the burdens of civilization, to advance their conditions in keeping with the best in our civilization? Are all its intendments and implications against social equity and equality? If so, then it had better be amended or discarded, but this court never tells us but that it comprehends all wisdom. I do not want to be charged with animadverting upon the Federal courts for rendering erroneous opinions, for I must take them at their word, and they say they are as liberal as the Constitution and precedents will permit. But I do complain that these high priests of the Constitution never mention the fact that the Constitution ought to be changed by amendment. On this subject they are as silent as the grave, and here I must be pardoned for quoting again from Mr. Jefferson:

On similar ground it may be proved that no society can make a perpetual constitution or even a perpetual law. The earth belongs always to the living generation. They may manage it then, and what proceeds from it, as they please during their usufruct. They are masters, too, of their own persons, and consequently may govern them as they please. But persons and property make the sum of the objects of government. The constitution and laws of their predecessors extinguished them, in their natural course, with those whose will gave them being. This could preserve that being till it ceased to be itself and no longer.

So, Mr. Jefferson thought that no generation had a right to shackle, by any kind of law, succeeding generations. The Federal judiciary will not admit that it is adding anything original and new to the Constitution, but that it is only adapting the Constitution to new conditions as they arise. This is debatable ground, for I must charge that they are not expanding this instrument, as they might, by recognized judicial interpretation with the best thought of the age, breathing into it a holier life; no, they are building by the plan of accretions, which shall perish and pass away. To build for eternity can only be done by the life method; the other is the mechanical method, and is but a makeshift and ephemeral. Such is the patchwork method of building through precedents made by the dead, in size, a larger Constitution. It looks not to the life of the people, and the lines on which American civilization is evolving and developing. The new thought that makes for the uplift and betterment of the burden bearers of the nation, the borning anew of the imperishable principle of the brotherhood of man, that means finally the destruction of all unearned fortunes and an equitable distribution of profits. For true honesty, not legal honesty, is spiritual and it will not mix with dishonesty, which is material. Truth must triumph and truth comprehends honesty, and no doctrine of vested rights, which seeks to legalize dishonesty, can survive.

BROTHERHOOD OF MAN TO TRIUMPH.

Truth, honesty, mercy, and justice—and there is but one kind of justice—all find their roots in love, and the court to-day that has not this conception of justice is behind this age. The most solemn decisions of the courts and message of the President will not avail. They may tide over the day of correction for a decade or more, but there is no escape from the microbe of dishonesty, or moral turpitude. It is reactionary and must be reckoned with. Elimination or death is the alternative. Escape from one or the other is impossible. The law of moral retribution is world deep and will be justified.

If the courts refuse to hear the voice of the best thought of the age—for true law is a development, whether it be organic or municipal—touching government, and will not write it in their decisions affecting human rights and liberties based upon the brotherhood principle, and can not write it into their decisions, as the court seems to hold, construing the Constitution of the country, without doing violence to that instrument, the day will come, though it may be years in the future, and it ought to come, when the Constitution and the courts upholding it must pass away.

If there is to be any question as to who shall amend the Constitution—the whole people or the Federal courts—I am for the people and not for the Supreme Court of the United States, for the people will make it an organism, while the courts will make it a pile of precedents.

Property is municipal. It has no natural rights. They are all man-created and conventional, whereas man is God-created and in His own image and has inalienable natural rights. But his natural rights often seem to me to be as light as a feather compared with the vested rights of property under the constitutional provisions against the "impairing of the obligation of contracts" or depriving "any person of property without due process of law," which make property rights so sacred in this country.

The only questions asked by the property owner and the courts are: Was there a contract made, and does it exist now, and does it involve the rights of property? And if it does, there is no relief against it, because of social conditions and the inequality of the persons making it. Equity, we have always been told, will relieve against all forms of fraud, that it will protect the infant, the married woman, and the imbecile, but the common laborer, though he does not own anything in the world except his strong right arm, with a family to maintain, must be held strictly to the execution of his contracts, however inequitable and oppressive they may be, with no attempt to relieve against inequitable and hard conditions. Although these conditions lie at the very heart of the case, they are slurred over and property and its rights are lifted up by the mighty Aarons to be looked upon, that death and disease may fly away.

For a moment let us examine this point. The employer lives in his own home, surrounded by all the comforts of civilization; has money; controls all the tools of production, all the means of transportation; has social standing; is well known and respected, and is a man of influence in the affairs of life.

Hence he owns and controls practically all the forces of power, and is therefore independent—that is, he is not dependent upon any person, for he has all he needs and can use. On the other hand is the toiler, living in a small, rented house, the property of his employer, with a wife and children, no money, scant clothes, and but little provision, out of work, the future is dark and threatening, and everything looks hard, and this is but a true picture of a large class in my district and throughout the country. Can you, gentlemen, see any difference between these parties to the contract that they are about to make? If you can not, you are bereft of reason. Verily there is a difference, and a tremendous one, and real as can be; one that goes to the very core of any contract. One party is independent and free to act, the other is bound and shackled by his conditions, for which he is not responsible and which civilization has made for him and his class. The toiler is under moral duress, and the party of first part makes the contract and the toiler passively submits to it.

And yet there is only now and then a court broad enough and good enough and fearless enough that will interpret this contract on the very highest equitable principles, considerate of the weak and dependent party. But, bent upon preserving the inviolability of the contract as was Shylock, and again placing under the ægis of the law property rights, or vested right, growing out of this sacred contract another property decision is made, piling Pelion upon Ossa. All sight is lost of the laborer, the laboring classes, and their wrongs, the result of selfishness and the stupidity of all the ages.

The contract must be enforced. The bond calls for it, and the Constitution protects the vested rights of property, whether gotten by fraud or honestly, and does not bother itself as now interpreted about the divine right of God's children. These rights have not yet been defined by written constitutions and statutes. They live only in the brains of a few harmless but emotional altruists who talk inanely about the brotherhood of man.

EQUITY APPLICABLE TO CONTRACTS BETWEEN LABOR AND CAPITAL.

Yet this same court announces, with threadbare repetition, that equity is big enough, broad enough, and circumstantial enough to cover any case that may arise out of the contract to protect property, and I need not mention the cases in which the Federal judges (and my mind, in this connection, always reverts to that ground specimen of avoirdupois and brains, too, and who is now lovesick for the toiler and his demands) have pushed this principle to the limit of extending the jurisdiction to the case at bar, calling for a widening of the domain of equity power. This ubiquitous quality of American equity is only applicable in the protection of property and in increasing the rights of property.

If the equity courts have this inherent power to broaden their jurisdiction on account of the sanctity of property, why not broaden it so as to protect the toiler in his hard, new conditions, to which it seems he is being awakened as he comes up out of the mist of the eons of time? Why does not this great bulwark of American liberty, with its facile pen, write some new law in keeping with the spirit of the age, favorable to labor and labor strikes and the rights of labor growing out of the new economic conditions, the result of industrial combinations, as well as tomes of new law in defense of the strong and vested property rights?

It seems easy, in order to save property inviolate, to add to the Constitution, but how hard it is to swell that sacred instrument with real life—the life of live justice, not dead and hoary with age and covered with ashes—when men want just and higher wages, humane hours, and humane safety appliances!

CLIPPING FROM THE NEW YORK WORLD.

The justices of the United States Supreme Court have taken counsel together regarding the present-day political tendencies in both parties, so far as these seem to the justices to menace the Constitution. They have determined that upon them rests the burden of standing between the Constitution and popular passion. They intend at every point to meet these subversive tendencies and defeat them.

There is reason to believe that the late labor decisions of the court are merely the beginning of a series which will confront the innovators at every step. The decisions in question declared unconstitutional the employers' liability act and the Erdman compulsory arbitration act affecting disputes between labor and capital.

The justices are not confident that Congress can be relied upon to stand permanently between the Constitution and what one of the justices calls "the mob," and they are determined to fulfill their ancient function of a bulwark.

Supreme Court justices never hold conferences on political situations, but they are men like other men and talk over current subjects as others do. They have their ways of finding out what is thought by each without formal conferences. In this way they have been talking over the present dangerous situation, as it appears to them, and have reached an understanding of one another's views.

Whoever is President now and for the succeeding four years, the justices are confident that the composition of the court can not be changed in that time so as to interfere with their intention.

President Roosevelt has proposed that certain laws recently declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court be so changed as to meet the objection of unconstitutionality. Senator LA FOLLETTE and others have introduced measures to cure defects of unconstitutionality. It is extremely improbable that any measure which the Supreme Court regards as of dangerous tendency can pass muster before that bench, no matter how it is amended.

I have been assured that the quoted article from the World was authorized, and that it expresses the mental attitude of the court toward Congress, as the court contemplates Congress in the act of passing legislation intended to relieve the present perilous state of trade unions and the labor movement generally, which has been jeopardized because of hostile judicial legislation constantly being enacted by the Federal courts, just as Jefferson said they would enact. The assumption of these judges in lecturing Congress is grossly in bad taste, to say the least of it. The challenge has been flung into the arena, and I see no reason why it should not be taken up.

To me this portends not well for the future. It argues that the most significant discovery of the present age—the social conscience, the recognition in a degree unprecedented in all history of social responsibility, the demand with an unprecedented imperativeness for social justice, the substitution on an unprecedented scale of social morality for the hard creed of individualism—is not accepted by this powerful tribunal, which holds in its hands the destiny of the nation.

This country will have no Procrustean bed made for it by any power upon which it shall lie nolens volens, but it will make its own bed, even if it must employ other workmen to make it a new bed. Justice is not a foreign product, on which the Federal courts have a monopoly; it is but one phase of truth, and like the Medicean Venus, what we have of it has come to us in fragments, and we will transmit it to posterity, but rejuvenated, and these fragments posterity will fashion together as never before in the form of a regenerated goddess, and thy temple, Oh Justice, not yet, but partly, emerged from earth, will by and by burst forth through the labors of martyrs to the good and social justice, finished and beautified as never before, the admiration of the world and the glory of mankind. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise for a dual purpose——

Mr. SULZER. You are not going to fight a duel, are you? [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. No; I do not propose to spell the word in a way which is, perhaps, more familiar to some Members of the House. My purpose is, first, to say a few kind words for a bill which has not yet met the approval of the House, and, second, to also say a few kind words concerning the city of New York, which apparently in this session of Congress has not entirely met the approval of the House, either. I will ask to have read in my time the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13079) to amend section 21 of the immigration law.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 21 of the act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved February 20, 1907, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Provided further, That any alien who is now under sentence because of conviction in this country of a felony, or who may be hereafter convicted of a felony, shall, at the expiration of his sentence, be taken into custody and returned to the country whence he came in the manner provided by section 20 of this act."

SEC. 2. That section 21 of the said act, as so amended, is hereby reenacted.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, that bill came before the House on Monday under suspension of the rules. On a division the vote was 64 in the affirmative and 50 in the negative, not the necessary two-thirds. Some of the gentlemen who voted against the bill think along lines of general immigration somewhat as I do, or rather I think very largely as they do. Others who voted against it have in the past held very different views, and I wish to address a few remarks to each branch of the opposition.

I concede at the start that every one of the fifty who voted against it did so after as much thought and deliberation as could be had in forty minutes and from the highest possible conscientious motives. Now, it may be possible that my friends who are what one might term restrictionists on the immigration questions were a little bit suspicious of me as a Greek bearing gifts.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman be sent out of the country under his bill if he were a Greek?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman, if he were a Greek and came in and committed a felony, would go out in a hurry, and so would my interlocutor, whether he were a Greek or a barbarian, and he can take his choice between the two. Now, I put it to my friends on that side of the Chamber who are restrictionists, honest and sincere as I assume you to be, if you vote as a good many of you did in the last Congress to exclude every honest alien who has a sound body and a sound mind, but has not had the educational opportunities to learn to read and write, why, in the name of consistency, if you are opposed to immigration for any reason, will you not vote to deport the alien who has come in here, violated our laws, committed a felony, and served a term in a penitentiary? Do you think more of the criminal than you do of the honest, able-bodied, though illiterate, alien?

Mr. LEAKE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. LEAKE. Will not the same remarks apply to gentlemen on his own side of the House who voted against that resolution?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am not addressing any particular side; this is no question of politics.

Mr. LEAKE. I understood the gentleman to say "that side of the House."

Mr. BENNET of New York. If I said that, I want to amend it by saying "gentlemen on that side of the question."

Mr. LEAKE. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This deporting of the alien is intended as an additional punishment, is it not?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is it intended for?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It is the exercise of the right inherent in Congress to deport any or all of the aliens in this country, and we make a class—that is, those whose terms in State prison or the penitentiary expire some time in the future.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not saying whether I am in favor of the gentleman's resolution or not. I have not examined it carefully, but I want to ask if the net result to the alien or foreigner is not an additional punishment?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will be frank with the gentleman. I thoroughly believe that every criminal alien that is deported under this bill will regard it as a greater punishment than imprisonment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman so regard it himself?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Personally?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I certainly do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman know that punishment can be made so high that it is difficult to enforce it at all?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I know that, and I considered it before I drafted this bill.

Now, coming to gentlemen on my own side of the question—not my own side of the Chamber alone—with whom I have fought side by side on this immigration question, let me call your attention to the fact that the worst foe that an honest, law-abiding, foreign-born person in this country has is a dishonest, criminal, misbehaving foreign-born citizen among us. One Italian, walking up the streets of New York on Sunday and shooting one policeman, will attract more attention than 10,000 Italians, law-abiding, peaceable citizens, on that same day in our churches in New York City.

The foreign-born themselves want to get rid of these criminals. Now, I will say to the whole House, as a result of three and a half months in Europe for the Immigration Commission—talking with the chiefs of police, governors of provinces, talking with the plain, common people, talking with anybody that I thought knew anything about immigration—that the worst effect on the foreign criminal himself is produced by the impression that in this country, where we have very largely manhood suffrage, we are so afraid of the foreign-born voter that we will stand up for the foreign-born criminal because we are cowards. That is the impression they have abroad of us. I want to say that the vote of this House on Monday, when it gets over to Italy and to Turkey and to Austria, by wire or by newspaper, will confirm that impression in the mind of every Cammorista in Naples, every Mafiaist in Messina, every Black Hand in Palermo, and every Hunchahist in Constantinople. That is what they believe of this country They believe that we can not enforce the law and do not dare to enforce the law. I have had an Italian in Calabria, which is said to contain the most dangerous criminals, although I venture to doubt it, shake his finger across the table in the council room of his city hall and tell me about a man that came back from a village in the State of New York, a man who had been a carpenter earning $4 a day, and had felt his life to be unsafe in the State of New York; had gone back to Italy and worked for 60 cents a day because he felt safer in Calabria, Italy, than in the State of New York in a country village.

Such a situation as that is a disgrace to the American people. I corroborated that condition afterwards in four villages, where men had gone back from the United States to Italy for safety.

Mr. HARDY. Would it not be well for the State of New York to take charge of that state of affairs and enforce its laws and punish the violators of them itself?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not only the State of New York, but every other State, because they came back from other States. I am in favor of enforcement of law everywhere, in my State and in the gentleman's State, and when one of these aliens, who comes here on invitation, breaks the law and so imposes upon us, for his coming was not in good faith, I am in favor of sending him to jail in the interests of society, and then, after he is out of jail, of deporting him to the country whence he came.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman define what he means by a felony in his bill?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I am in favor of allowing every State to define that for itself—the United States statutes do it—and then of having the National Government enforce the decision of the State as to what constitutes a felony by deporting the man.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman know that a great many States make a misdemeanor a felony—that is, that misdemeanors in a great many States are made felonies?

Mr. BENNET of New York. With the qualification that I do not think it is a great many States, I admit, of course, that the definition differs in different States.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not true that all larcenies, petty as well as grand, in many States are made felonies?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I do not know about the laws of the different States, but I do know that there may be conditions in the States that will make it necessary to make a crime in one State a felony that is a misdemeanor in another. We have got the remedy in our hands to diminish criminality among the aliens in this country, and I call the attention of my friends from Illinois to the fact—not in gloating, because what happened in Chicago on Monday may happen in New York City to-day, and worse—that on the very day when they and some of my own colleagues from New York were opposing and voting against that bill an alien who had been in the country less than three months went to the residence of the chief of police in the city of Chicago and shot his son, attempted to shoot the father, shot an assistant, and was himself killed by the chief of police.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and the gentleman has a law against it, which we passed, has he not?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And why did the gentleman not enforce the law and deport the man before he shot the policeman?

Mr. BENNET of New York. No; we have not.

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly you have.

Mr. BENNET of New York. No.

Mr. MANN. The law is on the statute book now which the gentleman helped put through, and I voted for it. The gentleman is on the Immigration Commission. Now, why did not they deport the man?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Because there is just that omission in the law. The man had not committed any crime in Europe. He had not admitted the commission of any crime, had not been convicted of any, so far as I am advised, and therefore had a right to stay in this country.

Mr. MANN. But he was an anarchist, and there is no need of any law to deport that man—he is dead.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; but how about the poor wife and children that they were talking about here Monday?

Mr. MANN. That is about what the gentleman's law is aimed at—deporting dead men.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Pass the law for us and we will deport lots of live ones.

Mr. MANN. Why not enforce the law you have now?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Because, as I pointed out to the gentleman, there was no way. This man had not committed any crime, and as far as there being any proof that he was an anarchist, I do not know that any exists. His people deny it.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman laid great stress upon this thing at that time.

Mr. BENNET of New York. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman himself may not have laid great stress upon it, but great stress was laid upon it in the House. I think I voted against the proposition myself to permit the Government to deport anybody on the ground that he was an anarchist, and I would do it again.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The gentleman is entirely mistaken as to last year, because the provision deporting anarchists was section 39 of the act passed in 1903. We simply reenacted that part of the old statute last year.

Mr. MANN. Well, it was in the bill that went through last year.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly; everything was in the bill. It was a general revision.

Mr. HARDY. I want to ask the gentleman a question in respect to his definition of what a felony is. It differs in different States, and some men might be punished by deportation in the State of Texas and not by deportation in the State of New York or some other States, because one State made the act which they committed a felony and the other did not.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Unquestionably.

Mr. HARDY. Then your law would be uncertain.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not at all. When a man in Texas committed a felony and went to the Texas State prison he would know he would be deported. When he committed a felony in the State of New York and was sent to our prison he would know he would be deported.

Mr. HARDY. Supposing your anarchist or foreigner is a constitutional lawyer?

Mr. BENNET of New York. He knows as much about the law as anybody else; he is not a fool ordinarily.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. May I ask the gentleman a question? Has the gentleman any statistics showing how many aliens in the United States have been convicted for felony?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Oh, of course I have not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact a very small proportion of the total number are convicts?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It might be a small proportion, but it would be a very considerable number of people.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not also true that the chief deterrent of crime is not the severity and amount of punishment, but the certainty of punishment, and is not the chief trouble of the States to which the gentleman refers now the fact that men are not being convicted of anything?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Oh, no. If you had this law, the alien criminal would not come here, to begin with, because he now regards this country as an asylum, and they break the laws of their own country by coming without passports and on false and forged passports in order to come to our country deliberately to pursue a life of crime.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said that if we had this law the alien criminal would not come here. Have we not now a law prohibiting the alien criminal from coming here?

Mr. BENNET of New York. We have a law.

Mr. MANN. For that purpose?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes; if the gentleman will permit me to answer the question—well, I have answered that question. We have a law.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman admits we have a law requiring that now.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I say, yes.

Mr. MANN. Now, does the gentleman think that one-tenth or one one-hundreth of the persons who commit crime have any expectation a year ahead of committing a crime?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will answer the gentleman by saying there are some Black Hand men coming here now from Palermo, Sicily, not under passports, not with the connivance of their Government, but in violation of the laws of Italy, with the deliberate intention of committing crime in our country; it has been that way at any time during the last five years.

Mr. MANN. Well, have we not a law covering that now?

Mr. BENNET of New York. We have a law, but among the things our Commission has discovered in that law are weaknesses and defects, which is one of the reasons why we went abroad, and I think we will find a way to stop that; but I want, in addition to stopping the criminals from coming in the future, to send back those who came through the weakness of our own laws in the past.

Mr. MANN. Does not the present law provide for the deportation of the class of men to which you have just referred?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Deportation?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If they have committed a felony.

Mr. MANN. I am not talking about your bill; I am talking about the law. The men who come here for the purpose of committing a crime, the class of men you are talking about, does not the present law forbid their entrance and provide for their deportation?

Mr. BENNET of New York. That can not be answered yes or no. If these men have committed a crime abroad involving moral turpitude, our law provides that they shall be kept out, and if they get in they can be deported at any time within three years, but there are defects in the law. I am not going into those exact defects——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know of any cases of that kind of people coming into our country which he states?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Why, certainly.

Mr. MANN. How does the gentleman know of such cases when no one has been deported for such reason?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that in the first place people have been deported for that reason. We deported within the last year the chief of the Camorra, who committed a murder in Naples, fled to this country, was apprehended by the officials of the Department of Commerce and Labor and sent back to Naples for trial, and I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to watch the newspapers during the next month.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is asking too much.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Well, watch the Chicago newspapers; even that is a good deal.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. May I ask the gentleman. The gentleman from Illinois seems to be troubling the gentleman from New York somewhat with this inquiry. It has been stated here, in the case of the Chicago anarchist who was killed, that it was not developed at all that he was an anarchist until the post-mortem examination was held.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I see that Miss Emma Goldman denies that he was an anarchist at all. The gentleman from Illinois is not troubling me. I think he is assisting me in elucidating the point. This law, in addition to what I have——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman let me inquire if the present law is being enforced?

Mr. BENNET of New York. The present law is being admirably enforced.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is it enforced most—in New York City or in the cities of the interior?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Of course it is enforced most in New York, because there is where the most come through.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it vigorously enforced in New York?

Mr. BENNET of New York. It is vigorously enforced. I will say to the gentleman that not only the Commission feel, but independent bodies not connected with our Commission, who have sent people through New York as immigrants, unanimously report relative to the enforcement of the law there that it seems to be as vigorous as it can be.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Let me suggest this to the gentleman: I see that you are laboriously investigating this matter. Why do you not authorize our consul or some representative of the United States in Naples to give a certificate of good character before he permits an individual to come into the United States? Why not start it over there before the lion is turned loose over here?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will say to the gentleman that that is one of the suggestions being considered by our commission.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I suggested it four or five years ago.

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. The question has been raised of the difference between what constitutes a felony in Texas and in New York. Now, would it not obviate all the objections that seem to be in the mind of the gentleman in regard to that, if my colleague would amend his bill, applying it only to those convicted of an offense punishable under the laws of the State by imprisonment in a State prison?

Mr. BENNET of New York. That suggestion has been made.

Mr. PAYNE. That would make it uniform, it seems to me, and obviate that objection.

Mr. BENNET of New York. If every State had a State prison, that would be uniform.

Mr. PAYNE. Or a term beyond a year in the penitentiary. I am not particular about the verbiage. But it seems to me we might get at a uniform system in the United States in that way. And a further suggestion occurs to me, that while it is sometimes difficult to prove that a crime has been perpetrated by an alien coming into the country, in the foreign country, in the cases under this bill it renders it certain that a crime has been committed, because the crime has been committed here, and there is a conviction for the crime, and, therefore, if in these cases it is right to deport criminals at all there could be no mistake.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Not in the slightest.

Mr. PAYNE. Have an exact language as to the criminal and the crime in this country.

Mr. FLOYD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I have only four minutes. Suppose that you get the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to give me five or ten minutes. The gentlemen on that side have been taking my time a good deal.

Mr. FLOYD. In my State we have a number of crimes that are felonies under the law—that is, the punishment may be by imprisonment in the penitentiary and at the same time it may be by fine, and often a court or a jury convicts and imposes a small fine. Yet our highest court has adjudicated that is a conviction in a felony case, and I think your bill as drafted would cause those men to be deported for an offense that could be considered trivial. And if the bill was amended as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], providing for imprisonment in the penitentiary, or something of that kind, that objection might be removed.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment? I want to suggest that in my State nothing is a felony that is not punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. But there are a great many degrading offenses and a great many serious offenses which are not denominated as felonies under our law, and it seems to me you ought to amend it so as to let it cover those offenses of a lesser grade than that of a felony. It seems to me that the bill ought to include such offenses as that.

Mr. BENNET of New York. The two gentlemen who have spoken last illustrate the difficulty that a man would fall into if he would attempt to cover the differing laws in the different States.

Mr. WALDO. What provision has the gentleman made in case of an honest man who comes here and declares and lives in this country nearly six years, perhaps marries and has children, but who in a quarrel or in the heat of passion may have committed what might be manslaughter in the second degree? Ought he to be sent back?

Mr. BENNET of New York. A man that commits a crime in the nature of murder and is tried, sentenced, and goes to jail, I do not think we can make an exception of.

Mr. WALDO. How about his wife and children?

Mr. BENNET of New York. He ought to have thought about his wife and children before he committed the crime.

Mr. WALDO. Is not that true of the American as well?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Exactly; but we can not deport an American.

Mr. WALDO. I think it is a little too late to deport a man of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the gentleman want some more time? If so, I will yield him five minutes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I thank the gentleman for yielding me five minutes, during which I must decline to be interrupted. I want at least these five minutes in which to speak about the financial situation in New York.

I want to assure some gentlemen on both sides of the House who seem to think that we are going to the "demnition bow-wows" in New York, which we are not, that we had more money in our savings banks in New York City on the 1st day of January than we have ever had before in the history of our State—$1,380,399,090, to be exact.

There is a general impression that all our banks suspended payment of currency. That is a mistake. I had with me yesterday in the gallery the president of a bank that never denied a man a dollar that was entitled to it during all that time; and in my own bank, whenever I put any money in, I could get it out. [Laughter.]

I sent a letter to every man in my district last fall—51,000.

Mr. SULZER. It would not be advisable to deport that many.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I can not even yield to the newly married gentleman from New York [laughter], except to congratulate him on his marriage.

Mr. SULZER. Much obliged to you.

Mr. BENNET of New York. They told me that I had better not send out these 51,000 letters, because there were so many men out of work and I would get so many requests for places that I could not be reelected next year because I could not fill them. I sent out 51,000, and for a while I got replies to the extent of 200 a day. I got, of course, the usual letter from the man who wants a political job—him we have with us always—and from the man who wants a job as a day watchman for six hours a day at Amsterdam avenue and the corner of One hundred and twenty-seventh street, and nothing but that; but of the appeals from men out of work I got fewer than thirty; and, furthermore, I secured places or offers of places enough from various friends and sources so that I was able to offer employment to every man in my district [applause] who wrote to me for work.

The association for improving the conditions of the poor, which has investigated the condition of the homeless men, reports, in the plenitude of their years of experience, that less than 1 per cent of the homeless men in New York City would work if they could get it. We have always men out of work, always have destitution, and always will have in a city of 4,000,000 people, and we will always have a sad, disheartening army—the kind of a man that would not work if he could get it, and could not work if he would—in a city that keeps about three saloons on the four corners of the streets. That is what builds up in a great measure that class of destitution in New York always. Furthermore, for the month of January the postal receipts fell off about 6 per cent as compared with last year, and for the month of February, leaving out the extra day, my colleague [Mr. PARSONS] has just received a statement from the postmaster there showing that the receipts fell off less than 3 per cent.

We are not asking any help in New York or pleading for any charity, and do not want anybody's sympathy and have not asked anybody for a public collection.

Mr. MANN. That does not apply to the United States Treasury. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. We will take our share just the same as people from any other part of the country. I have not seen any indisposition on the part of anybody else. [Laughter.]

Now, in relation to the currency question. In our city this is strictly a business question. I am glad to see that our Banking and Currency Committee has not divided on strictly party lines. We have, counting in our colleagues Representatives COCKS and ANDRUS, nineteen Members from the city districts. I have consulted with some of my Republican colleagues and some of my Democratic colleagues, including Representatives COCKRAN and FORNES, who took such creditable part in the running debate with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FOWLER] some time since. I am not authorized to speak for the delegation nor for any Member but myself, but I think I can assure the House that our nineteen votes will be found with anybody on either side of the House who endeavors to obtain ample discussion of the currency question and full power of amendment of any measure presented. With one possible exception, I know of no votes from New York City for the Aldrich bill in its present form. The distinguished Senator whose name the bill bears may, however, have amendments which will make it better. He has referred to them several times in debate. I can assure the House also, knowing my colleagues from New York City as I do, that we shall bring to the discussion of the currency question no thought to obtain mere partisan advantage and no captious criticism. Such knowledge as we have or may acquire will be at the service of any sincere effort for good legislation. Ours is the chief city in the land in commerce, manufacture, and business. A safe elastic currency of a known and certain value is a necessity to us. Without it industry languishes, the unemployed increase, and suffering comes to women and innocent children. The man among us from New York who would use this great problem to advance his own interests or those of his party to the detriment of proper and speedy legislation would be driven by popular opinion from public life.

I append, Mr. Chairman, an article from the New York Sun showing the praiseworthy efforts of the Italians of our city to bring the criminals of their own race to justice. I have always predicted this, and regard it as a proof of true American spirit.

FIGHT THEIR OWN CRIMINALS—ITALIANS FORM A VIGILANCE PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION—LOCALLY IT WILL COMBAT SO-CALLED "BLACK HAND," WHICH SPEAKERS SAY ISN'T ORGANIZED HERE—AS FAR AS ITALY TO IMPROVE THE IMMIGRANT—BOMBISTS ABSENT.

The Italian Vigilance Protective Association was organized last night for the purpose of putting a stop to crimes among the Italians of this city and for the betterment of the race in this country. A permanent organization was formed in Bollettino Hall, 178 Park row, where a mass meeting was held in answer to an appeal of Frank L. Frugone, editor of the Bollettino della Sera, an Italian newspaper, that the law-abiding Italians protest against outrages perpetrated by their criminal countrymen.

More than a thousand Italians tried to crowd into a little hall whose capacity at the outside is 500. Fearing that bomb throwers might appear, a squad of policemen from the Elizabeth street station and a dozen detectives from Joe Petrosino's command were on hand, but the expected didn't happen.

It was decided to establish branches of the association throughout the city, prepare an appeal to all Italians in the United States to maintain law and order, to form an arbitration board which will settle differences among themselves and with others, and to appoint a committee to draft a memorial asking the Italian Government to instruct prefects of police to teach emigrants to obey the laws and quit carrying firearms.

Primarily the meeting was to protest against the crimes which newspapers have attributed to the Black Hand. Right off the bat the speakers one after another declared there was no such thing as a Black Hand organization in this city, and they put all the bomb throwing outrages and the mysterious murders and shootings that have baffled Petrosino and his men up to individual criminals. The Black Hand, the speakers said, existed only in the minds of Americans.

John J. Freschi, a lawyer, who spoke in English, suggested that the meeting petition the State legislature to make the crime of extortion and blackmail punishable by twenty-five years in prison, and send kidnappers to the electric chair. He said 300 or 400 Italian policemen are needed on the force, 200 detectives for Petrosino's squad, an Italian assistant district attorney, and an Italian judge on the general sessions bench. He suggested that the Bennet law now before Congress should be amended so that convicted aliens should be deported as soon as they are found guilty, and not after serving their sentences.

Mr. Frugone attacked the newspapers for ascribing recent crimes to the Black Hand.

"Blackmail, kidnapping, and bomb throwing are the barbarous crimes of the present day," he said. "They are perpetrated by criminals whom common law repudiates, and who if discovered would be punished to the severest extent of the law.

"In the name of justice and humanity we hereby emphatically and most earnestly protest against this destruction of property, this continual blackmail, and all other murderous attempts, and do solemnly declare our purpose to make these criminals obey the laws.

"The newspapers report that certain Italians are the principal villains who use blackmailing, kidnapping, and bomb throwing for their criminal satisfaction. If that is established, we will certainly use our greatest efforts to bring these criminals to justice."

Mr. Frugone, who was chairman of the meeting, was elected president of the association and proclaimed leader of the new movement. In his speech, which was interrupted by numerous "Bravos!" he pointed out that there are 400,000 Italians in New York City, and that they had not been getting a square deal. He praised Police Commissioner Bingham, but said the responsibility of the continued so-called "wave of crime" among the Italians was due to inadequate police protection. He said the Italians were entitled to protection, and that it was up to the police department to give it to them, and he advised all who sustained property losses by bomb explosions to sue the city for damages.

"This country has opened its arms to us and given shelter and protection to all comers. We must, and will, stand united against this gang of evildoers, whatever their nationality may be, who are bringing to this Republic their disgraceful character and abominable crimes, which may result in the prohibition of all immigrants as undesirable citizens."

All of the speakers, who included the Rev. Father Eucheria Gianetto, director of the Journal of Italian Catholics in America; G. Ruggio, editor of L'Araldo; Louis Leone; August Bianchi, the banker, and B. Ciambelli, editor of L'Grapho, urged the Italians to loosen their tongues when they knew of crimes. They pointed out that in nearly every case of an Italian outrage the victims themselves have shown hesitation about aiding the police.

"Be fearless and brave, and don't hesitate about giving the criminals up," said Father Gianetto, "and soon there will be an end to these outrages."

Another speaker told of the lawabiding Italians in the South American countries, where the so-called "Black Hand" was unknown. It only went to show, he said, that the crimes in the Italian quarters of this city could only be laid to individuals.

A meeting of the Vigilance Protective Association will be held in Bollettino Hall next Monday night, when further steps will be taken to put an end to Italian crimes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to occupy the remainder of the time this afternoon.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] fifteen minutes.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], who to-day spoke so eloquently about margins, a short time ago called our attention to a hold-up on the streets of the city of Washington, and he tried to establish a connection between that crime and the influence of liquor. Now, according to the laws of gravitation, no intoxicated man can run as that fellow did. Those light-footed policemen of this city could not reach him; but if it is true that the action of a man is accelerated by medicine of that kind, why, I say to you, give it to the members of the Committee on Ways and Means. [Laughter.] While I called attention to the fact some weeks ago that petroleum was not on the free list, these gentlemen have not yet acted, and the result has been that the people of the United States have continued to pay 2 or 3 cents a gallon more for American oil than the people of England. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In fact, if the committee had acted on it on the spur of the moment, carried away by my eloquence, they would have already saved the people of this country $1,116,182.34. And if they act right now they will save the people of this country $37,206.07 every twenty-four hours. [Applause.]

Now, I referred to that hold-up under the shadow of the night, to which our attention was called by the gentleman from Tennessee, for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to another hold-up that is being perpetrated every day of the year right here in the city of Washington, in one of the most prominent buildings on Pennsylvania avenue, the Post-Office Department.

On page 14, commencing in line 9 of the bill before us, we find an item of $300,000 for the purchase or rental of canceling machines.

The great number of these machines are rented, because the owners of the invention will not sell them to the Government.

The present owners, it is safe to say, are not the original inventors, but probably, as is generally the case, either bought the patent for a paltry sum or scared some brainy but poor genius out of his patent by threatening him with an infringement suit.

Now, those in charge of post-office matters, anxious to place labor-saving machines in the different offices, did not insist, as they should have done, upon purchasing these machines or not taking them at all, but they did as was dictated to them by the owners of the several patents—they rented the machines.

Now, if the rent had been somewhat in proportion to the real value of the machines, and if the rent could have been agreed upon for a long term of years, this, while even then wrong in principle, might have passed.

But it becomes a hold-up if the annual rent amounts to 30 or 50 per cent profit on the investment.

There are now 1,540 such machines rented at an annual rental of $256,920. Here is a list of them, procured from the First Assistant Postmaster-General:

CANCELING MACHINES.

Statement showing the number of canceling machines under contract and now in use, the rental price, and the total amount that would be required if all machines were in use the full year.

Made by—	Number.	Annual rate of rental.	Total annual rent.
International Postal Supply Co., New York, N. Y.:
Hey & Dolphin "Flier"	259	$400	$103,600
Hey & Dolphin model S	72	150	10,800
Hey & Dolphin model L	183	90	16,470
American Postal Machines Co., Boston, Mass.:
Combination	385	150	57,750
Drop-feed	283	100	28,600
Hand-power	215	80	17,200
Columbia Postal Supply Co., Silver Creek, N. Y.	68	150	10,200
Barry Postal Supply Co., Oswego, N. Y.	62	150	9,300
Time Marking Machine Co., Chicago, Ill.	10	300	3,000
Total	1,540		256,920

It was a mistake in the first place to ever take a single machine that could not be acquired by purchase—we got along without them before, and we could have continued to do so—unless the owners of the inventions had been willing to sell us those machines outright.

I for one shall oppose the renting of another machine after the present contract has expired. If we can not purchase them, let us return to the old methods, and thus give employment to some of those who are looking for a job.

One high in authority in the Post-Office Department tells me that an excellent and practical canceling machine has lately been invented in Europe. I am ready to give preference to the inventions of Americans, but only if they are willing to sell their machines at reasonable prices.

This incident again shows us the great necessity of remodeling our patent laws. The Government of Germany reserves the right of purchasing any patent that is of exclusive use in some department of the Government or such inventions that by virtue of the patent can only be procured by the public at an exorbitant price. However, the German Government treats the patentee very fairly in having a commission of three appointed to settle on the price to be paid—one by the Government, the other by the patentee, and the third by the two others.

Another matter that in the bill before us will be called to our attention is found in the third line of page 19—$4,800,000 for railway post-office car service. Most of this is for rent of mail cars.

By one who has looked into this matter I am told that the rent paid for seven or eight years would purchase all the mail cars needed. If such is the case, Uncle Sam is far from being a good business manager. The annual rent for these cars is, according to size, from $25 to $40 per mile traveled daily, so that the rent of a postal car from my home in Wisconsin to the city of Chicago, about 200 miles, would be from $5,000 to $8,000 a year, according to the size of the car. If the same car returns within twenty-four hours, as I believe is the case, it would be double the amount, or $10,000 to $16,000 a year. Such a car could probably be built and equipped for from $25,000 to $35,000.

If the daily mail averages 1,000 pounds, which it probably does on the line referred to, $100 per mile is allowed in addition, by act of March 3, 1873, for carrying the mail—200 miles, $20,000.

No matter what the first cost, let the United States own its mail cars and whatever else is needed in the several Departments and quit paying an exorbitant rate of interest on the investment of private owners.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Chairman, national extravagance, like individual extravagance, leads to no good. A few years ago a "billion-dollar Congress" was an accusation. Now a "two-billion-dollar Congress" is a Republican boast, and more a-coming; at least more is proposed. It is about time to call a halt.

The President in his first message to this Congress informed us that the Secretary of War, who is now supposed to be the Presidential legatee, had gone to the Philippines and that, on his return, his report on the islands would be submitted, from which I infer that whatever recommendations the Secretary would make would be the President's own.

On the subject of the Philippines I find in the Annual Report of the Secretary of War for 1907 recommendations for the expenditures of large sums of money in these islands for the establishment of a regimental post, the enlargement of the Fort McKinley Reservation, and the building by the Government of "an electric or other railway" from the north shore of Mindanao to Keithley, on Lake Lanao. The report informs us that Keithley is 3,000 feet above the sea, and that it is a very healthful spot.

I have no doubt but that if this Government would but go into the railroad business in Mindanao, building "an electric or other railroad" to Lake Lanao, that beautiful lake which the Secretary tells us is 3,000 feet above the sea and very healthful would soon prove a rival to Lake Como.

Mr. Chairman, the impenetrable forests of Mindanao can all be conquered, and beautiful lakes 3,000 feet above sea level can be made accessible if we but give up our dream of internal improvements on our own continent and follow the recommendations of Mr. Taft and sink our National Treasury in the isles of Hellabaloo in the Philippine group.

Why plan an Atlantic inland waterway or the Lakes-to-the-Gulf scheme when we have such beautiful and healthful spots as Lake Lanao, in Mindanao, 3,000 feet above the sea, which requires a railroad and the Government to build it?

But in the Philippine group there are over a thousand islands and many more beautiful lakes and healthful spots. The prospect is limitless. The Secretary's recommendation that the Government build this railroad to Lake Lanao is but an entering wedge. Up with the flag! Let our patriotism know no limit. More Government railroads! The Philippines are ours, every one of them, so let us have a railroad for every isle. More Lake Lanaos, 3,000 feet above the sea. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, we can make the Italian lakes look like street puddles. Grind down the poor departmental clerks; stop public buildings in small cities; give up all hope of inland waterways in our generation; stop all internal improvements, for lo, the Government must go into the business of building and operating railroads in the Philippines!

Oh, let the people know what is proposed to be done in the Philippines, and then listen to them call a halt.

I quote the following from a very interesting book entitled "With Speaker CANNON Through the Tropics," written by a most energetic, cultured, and distinguished Member of this Congress, my friend and colleague, Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, of Philadelphia, from which it will be seen that the appalling weight of the Philippines is being felt even by those wedded to the Republican policies.

At page 403 in his delightful book Mr. MOORE says, quoting Secretary Taft:

"We expended in the Cuban war $300,000,000, and we have never invited from Cuba the return of a single cent. In establishing order in the Philippines we expended $170,000,000," the Secretary informs us, and then, answering a certain line of argument, adds: "It may be objected that the $170,000,000 or more expended by the United States in suppressing the insurrection in the Philippines was not for the benefit of the Filipino people, resulting as it did in the death of many. This is a narrow view. No money or blood was ever spent more directly for the benefit of a people than this. * * * The war was deplorable, but no other possible alternative was open to us in the discharge of our duty as a nation."

"Our duty as a nation." In that single sentence warm-hearted Secretary Taft speaks with all the kindliness and indulgence of the great American people. Having no other alternative, he presents the condition that confronts us. On one side of the account "for the development and upbuilding of Porto Rico, the preservation of peace in Cuba, and the education and civilizing of the Philippines" we are charged with the expenditure of $300,000,000 of the revenues of the United States; on the other side of the account we are credited with "our duty as a nation." The problem first confronted us nine years ago. It was thrust upon us, and we accepted it. It has not resulted in profit to the United States, except as we may regard it profitable to take of our own substance and bestow it upon other and less-favored people. Fortunately we are at peace with all the world and may now discuss the entire question calmly. If the situation were otherwise, we would doubtless continue to carry our burden and not discuss it at all. How far, then, does the duty of the United States as almoner and protector of restless islands extend? Is it our duty, in the case of Porto Rico, to at once admit that island to citizenship equal to that of Maine or California, when we deny it to Arizona and New Mexico? * * * The same Cuban war which involved us in a $300,000,000 expenditure brought us the Philippines. Dewey and destiny placed in our care 7,000,000 black people thousands of miles across the sea.

They are more remote from us than the West Indies are from the controlling European powers. The expense of taking and maintaining the Philippines has been $170,000,000, enough, if applied to the deepening of inland waterways in the United States, to complete the Lakes-to-the-Gulf project along the Mississippi Valley and the chain of inland waterways along the Atlantic coast from Massachusetts to North Carolina. We maintain civil officials and 12,000 of the flower of the United States Army in the Philippines. If we had to defend the islands from attack by water it would doubtless engage the entire Navy of the United States. We would fight for the Philippines "to the last ditch." That is the temper of the American people. We would not yield them by compulsion, but when no hostile power threatens, why not take counsel of each other?

The Philippines are far away; they are troublesome and expensive, and our hold upon them is unnatural. We had no desire to acquire them, and our dignity need not be offended if, in some honorable manner, we could manage to dispose of them.

* * * * * * *

The Philippines are of little commercial value to us; the West Indies would be. * * * What do we need in the Philippines more than a coaling station for naval purposes or a harbor for vessels engaged in the transportation of American commerce? What more than these in the West Indies do foreign nations require? The day of the buccaneer is gone, and the day of industrial expansion is at hand. Great nations are warring with each other, not for martial glory, but in legitimate and commendable contests for commercial supremacy. It is, after all, a war of the brains and the brawn of the nations. The United States is engaged in this world battle only to the extent of 5 per cent of her great manufacturing and agricultural output. Has she the time or the patience to extend it through the Philippines? And if she had, would her efforts in that direction compensate her for the expenditure and the risk? Is it her business to remain there if she can honorably withdraw and devote her money and the lives of her soldiers and sailors to worthy causes nearer home?

"We can not settle this in a day," said Speaker Cannon, referring to the Cuban complications. No more can we settle the tremendous problem of the Philippines in a day. They stand on our national books as both an asset and a liability. Shall they remain with us forever, a charge upon our bounty, to the prejudice of closed ties, or shall we let them go? The sky to-day is clear; it may not be always so. What, then, if some bright morning there should flash across the world the startling news that calm and thoughtful statesmanship had found a way to end our strange alliance, to return to us our soldiers, sailors, teachers, and statesmen from the Philippines for employment in more inviting fields in the West Indies and the great continent beyond?

I purposely put the argument in the form of questions, because it is impossible, in the absence of a plan of procedure, to declare a fixed policy. I believe the United States would be benefited if it could, in some honorable way, rid itself of control of the Philippines and assume control of the West Indies. The Philippines can not, in the nature of things, be made an integral part of this great nation; the West Indies might be absorbed and, in course of time, be made as truly a part of the United States politically as they are now geographically.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. MOORE has evidently given careful study to the subject, and has come to the same conclusion that anyone else will come to who will but carefully consider the situation.

Mr. Chairman, ten years of Republican extravagance, ten years of reckless disregard of the Constitution and its limitations, ten years of paying the expenses of one year by mortgaging the prosperity of the year after, have so largely unsettled the foundations of American political economy that Democrats, Democrats by study, by inquiry, by conviction, and by inheritance, naturally ask themselves and each other: "Where is the reversal of American policies in government to stop?"

It is less than ten years since, in Congress, a distinguished, outspoken, and farsighted American statesman expressed the fear of and coined the phrase "a billion-dollar Congress," and lo, almost a two-billion Congress has arrived. Speaker Reed's exclamatory boast that this is a billion-dollar country is an insufficient excuse for our present appalling extravagance.

According to the official statements of appropriations, the Fifty-ninth Congress at its last session appropriated $920,798,143 for 1908, or over $41,000,000 more than at the preceding session. At its first session the Fifty-ninth Congress appropriated $879,589,185, or $60,000,000 more than the Fifty-eighth Congress at the preceding session. In two years the Fifty-ninth Congress appropriated over $1,180,000,000, or an average increase of $50,000,000 a year. At this rate, by 1911 the Republicans, if then in office, will be able to celebrate the passing of the $2,000,000,000 mark.

For the four years under the second Administration of Grover Cleveland—1893–1896—the total appropriations amounted to $2,016,345,753. The total expenditures of the four full years of the Republican Administration following were $2,430,316,390. In the four-year period ending June 30, 1906, the aggregate of appropriations reached $3,153,334,292, an increase of $1,396,990,539 over Mr. Cleveland's second term. Exclusive of the Panama appropriations, the increase of expenditures in 1904 over 1903 was $35,496,995; in 1905 over 1904, $40,336,223; in 1906 over 1905, $17,903,836. The rate of increase has been much heavier during the last two years.

Against all this, against all waste of public moneys through extravagant or unnecessary appropriations, the Democratic party has uniformly protested and such misuse of public money is against traditional Democratic record and teaching. The theory of the Democratic party is now, as it has always been, that the Government's right to impose taxation upon its citizens is limited, strictly and constitutionally, to the needful expenses of the Government frugally administered. A government has no greater right to tax the citizens whom it serves for unnecessary expenditure under guise of needful appropriation than a private citizen has to take money from the pocket of another individual. All expenditures of government fall ultimately upon those whose labor and industry produce value, not upon those who are charged with the distribution of public moneys.

At a time like the present, when the pinching touch of financial stringency is making itself known in many homes, in many workshops, in many offices, and throughout the country generally, it is well for thoughtful men to recur to the immutable and long-recognized rules of governmental power which had their origin in the establishment of the Government of the United States and of which the Democratic party, the great conservative force in the nation, has always been the champion and protector. These rules limit the power of the General Government to Federal needs only and establish a theory of local government which has never been and never can be departed from with safety. Recurring panics, recurring financial disturbances, recurring demands for a revision of the currency law serve to make clearer the fact that any departure from the Democratic rule of local self-government, however successful it may be for a time, is fraught ultimately with great danger to the people.

The Democratic theory takes away governmental control from central points and distributes it to the various localities most interested in its wise and lawful exercise. It keeps at every man's home the greatest share of the political power that concerns him individually. It yields it to the remoter legislative bodies in diminishing proportions as they recede from the direct influence and action of the people. The principle of self-government is not the idea that the people in their collective capacity are endowed with wisdom, patriotism, and virtue superior to their individual characters. The people, as a society, are as virtuous or as vicious, as intelligent or as ignorant, as brave or as cowardly, as the persons who compose it. The great theory of local self-government under which our country has expanded over a continent and has extended its sovereignty over other lands is founded on these propositions.

That government is most wise which is in the hands of those best informed about the particular questions on which they legislate; most economical and honest when controlled by those most interested in preserving frugality in expenditure; most strong when it only exercises authority which is beneficial in its action. These are obvious truths, but they are the foundation of the Democratic theory of patriotic American government. The legislation which most affects us is local legislation. The good order of society, the protection of property, the promotion of intelligence, the enforcement of statutes, or the upholding of moral restraints mainly depend upon the virtue and wisdom of the inhabitants of the minor civil divisions, not of the big and bustling cities of the country. Upon such questions, as far as they particularly concern themselves, the people are intelligent. The wisest statesmen living and acting at Washington can not understand these affairs, nor can they conduct them as well as the citizens upon the ground. What is true of one town is true of all towns in the United States.

The theory of local self-government is not founded upon any idea that the people are virtuous and intelligent, but it attempts to distribute each particular power to those who have the greatest interest in its wise and faithful exercise. It gives to every township the right to direct its own local affairs, the people of a town being more intelligent about their own affairs than the public of any other locality. In the same way it leaves to every county the legislation that pertains to the county, and to every State the legislation that pertains to the State. Such distribution of political power is founded on the principle that persons most interested in any matter manage it better than wiser men can who are not interested there. Government, like charity, begins at home.

The power to tax the consumer and the producer for the needs of government is limited to the requirements of the Government—that and no more. It is no part of the function of the Federal Government to promote or protect one particular interest any more than it is the right of the Government to discriminate and prejudice another. By degrees the expenditures of the United States Government have been growing in much more rapid ratio than either the population of the country, great as it is, or the resources of the country, vast as they are. In times of financial difficulty the Democratic party renews its admonition, made so many times before, that the Government, like an individual, should live always within its means, and not be pledging the people's substance of the day under the hope of capitalizing the shadow of their prosperity to-morrow.

I represent, sir, a constituency made up almost exclusively of producers, of those who either on the farm or in the mill, in the mines or in the workshop, contribute unceasingly their toil to the great stream of prosperity which makes this country pre-eminent among the nations of earth to-day. But no amount of labor or industry can permanently be made useful and productive if the established rules of economic science as to governmental expenditure are disregarded, and if the Federal Government itself is permitted to encroach upon the rights of the States and of the various localities. There is no highroad to governmental finance which discards the ordinary teaching of the past in this country or elsewhere. It is the farmer more than anyone else who has reason to be most deeply interested in the question of taxation. The gains of the farmer, which are the profits of husbandry and which are due as much to fertile fields and smiling skies as well as to his own labor comes slowly and often with great difficulty.

No fortunate speculations, no favoring turns of the markets, and no speculative hazards fill his little treasury or replete his private store. It is his toil, patient, continuous, and often poorly rewarded, which enables him to meet the requirements of his farm, the care for his family, and to provide for the inevitable to-morrow. If the Government does not foster and help him, it can at least refrain from imposing upon his shoulders unnecessary and wasteful taxation, and the protest of the farmers of the United States is beginning to be heard in opposition to a course which has at times of great public prosperity made no provision for the lean and slender days of reaction which may follow. Industry may languish, production may diminish, the number of the unemployed may enlarge, but the expenses of the Federal Government under Republican rule are penses of the Federal Government under Republican rule are going on at full head, without any suggestion of diminution and without any regard for those whose labor must pay the bill.

It is time that a halt was called upon such expenditures and that the badge of distinction which within the past ten years has been the extent to which public money has been used should become henceforth due to the extent to which the Public Treasury is protected against the forays made upon it, either under pretext of protecting certain interests or of establishing new policies without warrant of the people's authorization or support.

Next year the people of the United States will pass upon the record of the Republican party in its use of public moneys, and the Democratic party, true to its uniform record of frugality under the Constitution, welcomes the challenge which that appeal invites.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee yields ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the other day the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] spoke very entertainingly on the subject of the tariff. Of course in the limited time accorded to me I have not risen for the purpose of endeavoring to reply to the remarks made by the gentleman on that occasion. I listened most attentively to every word he uttered and failed to learn wherein any of the thousands of idle workmen in this country now walking the streets of the cities seeking employment could draw any consolation from the gentleman's speech. He spoke of the unanimity existing in Republican ranks. He spoke of the harmony pervading the Republican Administration, all the way from the Chief Executive down to the lowest office held by any Republican in this Administration. He had much to say of the harmony existing between the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, and lauded in the very highest degree the Chief Executive.

Mr. Chairman, to show that the harmony is not shared in by all of the Republicans in high places, I wish to have read a part of an interview given out by the Republican Senator from Kentucky, recently elected by the legislature of that State, and ask that the Clerk read that part which I have marked.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

He says the Republicans will have no walk-over in the Presidential contest, and that Taft's nomination would by no means make certain his election. Mr. Bradley says:

"With the labor unions and negroes against him, it is exceedingly doubtful whether Taft could carry the States of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, New Jersey, New York, and possibly others. There can be no hope of carrying Kentucky, West Virginia, or Maryland. He will not get the electoral vote of any of the extreme Southern States."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have another statement found in the Washington Post, which appeared on the 2d day of March. It will be remembered, not only by the House, but by the whole country, that the President has sent two messages to this Congress and has urged the Republican party, his party, to enact certain legislation, and up to the present time not a single measure recommended by him has been enacted by the Republicans of this body. That does not indicate very much harmony between the powers that be here on this floor and the Chief Executive of the United States; and to illustrate how the President is feeling on the subject of harmony, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask that the statement be read, headlines and all.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the paper will be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

PRESIDENT DEMANDS LAWS—WILL NOT PERMIT CONGRESS TO ADJOURN WITHOUT DOING WORK—SQUARE BREAK WITH MR. ROOSEVELT PREDICTED IF LEGISLATIVE PROGRAMME IS NOT CARRIED OUT.

NEW YORK, March 2, 1908.

A Washington dispatch to the Times says:

"The cheerful inactivity which has prevailed at the Capitol for the last two weeks will not be permitted to continue much longer. Congress is going to wake up pretty soon; and if it is not roused of its own volition, something will happen in its neighborhood not at all conducive to somnolence.

"It has been remarked widely recently that the President seems in a fair way to lose his entire legislative programme for this session. The 'reactionaries' were having things their own way, and it was to be a do-nothing session, despite the numerous and strenuous recommendations in the two messages.

"But it turns out that the President is still to be reckoned with and that he has no notion of permitting Congress to go home without enacting at least some of the measures he has asked for. If it does adjourn with only the appropriation bills to its credit, it will be at the cost of a square break with the President, and the country will have a chance to decide between them.

"Mr. Roosevelt will not hesitate to start the back-firing process, and there will be trouble for a good many men who now see their way clear to reelection. The President has been taking stock on his own account, and he is convinced that his policies are just as popular as ever throughout the country, if not more so.

"He has had reliable information recently that demonstrates an extraordinary situation. This was indicated by a poll taken by a New York magazine, which sent letters to 12,000 of its subscribers, asking their preference for President. These subscribers represent all conditions of men of all shades of political opinion, and they are scattered all over the country, representing every Congressional district. Answers were received from all but about 600, and 90 per cent of those who replied were for Roosevelt.

"With such a situation behind him the President is determined that Congress shall either act on his recommendations for a new employers' liability law, for amendment of the Sherman antitrust law, and for a law governing the issue of securities by interstate corporations or face the consequences at home.

"The first of these measures is now in the hands of the Senate Judiciary Committee, in the shape of the Knox employers' liability bill. The other two bills are in process of construction, with friends of the President busily engaged in perfecting them. When they are completed they will be introduced in the Senate, and then the circus will begin.

"Those Congressmen who are figuring on an early adjournment and making preparations to get away about May 1 will find that they have some work to do before they leave Washington which they have not been planning on. The appropriation bills are in the usual long-session state of backwardness, but when it makes up its mind to work Congress has demonstrated that it can spend money at an amazing rate. It will not be in the money bills that cause for delay is found, but in the Sherman-law amendments, and in the securities law there is a fine field for constitutional discussion, as there was in the Hepburn rate law, and that is the prospect that is now open before the statesmen who are so anxious to get home to look after their political fences."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, again referring to the harmony mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], I will conclude my remarks by predicting that although the President has recommended the passage of a number of measures to this Congress, when we adjourn we will have passed the appropriation bills, and not a single law that has been recommended by the Chief Executive to his party, which controls all legislation, will be given to the country for the relief of the people who are suffering for the lack of legislation on the subjects indicated. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18347, the post-office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LOSS OF LIFE IN CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas information has reached the House of Representatives of the United States that scores of children to-day lost their lives in the burning of a schoolhouse in Cleveland, Ohio: Be it

Resolved, That the sympathy of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, extended to the bereaved city of Cleveland and the sorrowing homes of that city.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

REGULATION OF TERMS OF FEDERAL COURTS IN EASTERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16874) to amend section 13 of an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Texas into four judicial districts," approved March 11, 1902, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13 of an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Texas into four judicial districts," approved March 11, 1902, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows, this amendment becoming operative on and after June 1, 1908:

"SEC. 13. That the United States circuit and district courts for the eastern district of Texas shall be held in each year at the times and places, as follows:

"At Tyler, in the county of Smith, on the fourth Monday of January and the fourth Monday of April.

"At Jefferson, in the county of Marion, on the first Monday of October and the third Monday of February.

"At Beaumont, in the county of Jefferson, on the third Monday of November and the first Monday of April.

"At Sherman, in the county of Grayson, on the first Monday of January and the third Monday of May.

"At Paris, in the county of Lamar, on the first Monday of March and the third Monday of October.

"At Texarkana, in the county of Bowie, on the third Monday of March and the first Monday of November."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand that in this bill there are no new subdivisions and no new places for holding court. It is simply a rearrangement of the time.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It creates no new places; simply rearranges the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHEPPARD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE HON. GEORGE W. SMITH.

Mr. THISTLEWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives shall meet at 12 m. on Sunday, April 19, 1908, for the purpose of having eulogies upon the life, character, and public services of the Hon. GEORGE W. SMITH, late a Representative in Congress from the Twenty-fifth District in Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15247. An act to authorize the Idaho and Northwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Spokane River near the city of Coeur d'Alene, Idaho;

H. R. 3923. An act to fix the limitation applicable in certain cases; and SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 5, 1908.

The Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE, offered the following prayer:

For this cause we faint not. But though our outward man is decaying, yet our inward man is renewed day by day.

* * * * * * *

For we know if the earthly house of our tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building from God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

* * * * * * *

Now he that hath wrought us for this very thing is God, who also hath given to us the earnest of the Spirit.

Even so, Father, Thou art pleased to teach us the lesson of life, even at the moment of death. Thou hast promoted Thy servant to higher service, he that had trained himself for such service here. And now we ask Thee in Thine own holy spirit to quicken our spirits that we may not be afraid of the end; that we may accept in Thine infinite providence what Thou hast prepared for us beyond this line of earthly life; that day by day and hour by hour we may come nearer to Thee; and that we may open our eyes to see that larger and better world, and that wider life for which Thou hast prepared us.

Father, we thank Thee for the memories of such a life. We thank Thee for the service that he has rendered to this land. And we ask Thee to go with us, to go with all these who hear with sorrow of his death, as Thine own children. Amen.

Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings; when, on request of Mr. DILLINGHAM, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR REDFIELD PROCTOR.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, it is with profound sorrow that I announce to the Senate the death of Hon. REDFIELD PROCTOR, late a Senator from Vermont, which occurred at his apartments in this city last evening shortly before 5 o'clock, after an illness of less than a week. While it was known that the nature of his illness was serious, yet his condition was not considered critical until Tuesday evening, and therefore the announcement comes with a shock as well as with a sense of grief to all his friends and associates.

At some future time, and on an occasion appointed for that purpose, I hope to join with other friends of Senator PROCTOR in this body in paying to his memory that tribute of affection, confidence, and esteem which I know is felt by all, and to speak from a personal knowledge of what I conceive to be a remarkable life, one marked by great accomplishments.

Senator PROCTOR was a man of strong powers. He possessed keen judgment, an indomitable courage, and an energy that never lagged. His life was one of achievement along all the lines toward which his energies were directed, but however great these achievements have been, they never narrowed his sympathies nor affected his friendships.

He loved his State. He loved her people. His State loved him, trusted him, and honored him. To-day Vermont mourns the loss of her distinguished son.

In order that the Senate may give expression to the feeling which I feel sure is entertained by all his associates, I ask for the immediate consideration and adoption of the following resolutions:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont asks for the present consideration of resolutions which will be read by the Secretary.

The resolutions were read and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. REDFIELD PROCTOR, late a Senator from the State of Vermont.

Resolved, That a committee of seven Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to take order for arranging the funeral of Mr. PROCTOR.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect his remains be removed from Washington to Proctor, Vt., for burial in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives and request the House to appoint a committee to act with the committee of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed as members of the committee under the second resolution Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. DANIEL, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PERKINS, Mr. TALIAFERRO, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. HEMENWAY.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont proposes an additional resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to, and (at 12 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 6, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 5, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, for that deep and abiding faith which Thou hast made an integral part of our being and which under all the strange vicissitudes of life holds us close to Thee and which enables us with courage and fortitude to go forward to the daily tasks which come to us without fear, since Thou art infinite in wisdom, power, and goodness. Thou hast laid a heavy hand upon us in the removal of a public servant, whose strong mind and pure heart made him conspicuous in the affairs of state and nation. His work was of the highest order, his counsels wise and just; he will live in the hearts of his countrymen for what he was and for what he did, and be an inspiration to those who shall come after him.

Comfort, we beseech Thee, the hearts of his colleagues and friends and those to whom he was nearest and dearest by the ties of kinship with the blessed hope of the immortality of the soul, and teach us all so to live that when our days are numbered we may pass serenely on to that larger life in Thee. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution 283.

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor be authorized to have printed and bound whatever papers and documents in connection with subjects under consideration by the committee may be necessary to the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

WILLIAM POOR.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 598 and concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 598) granting an increase of pension to William Poor.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3848) for the relief of James A. Russell, and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department is hereby authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business during the Sixtieth Congress; also that the committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES.

Mr. McKINLEY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be allowed to have such printing and binding done as is necessary in the transaction of its business during the Sixtieth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS COOSA RIVER, ALABAMA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following House bill with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13102) to authorize the county of Elmore, Ala., to construct a bridge across the Coosa River, Alabama.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, many of the States in the Union have adopted laws prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, which is a proper subject of police regulation, and in other States, under local option, many counties are dry. These laws are passed under the police powers of the States, and should be enforced when the sentiment of the people in these States and communities has declared that it is in the interest of order and good morals that intoxicating liquors should not be sold. You can not have prohibition in any State or community when intoxicating liquors can be shipped from a wet State into a dry one; you merely substitute the jug trade for the open saloon, and though the jug trade may not be as injurious to good morals and good order as the uncontrolled sale of liquor, yet the temperance sentiment of these communities, as expressed by the people, is then overthrown and not enforced and many of the evils of intemperance still exist.

The jug trade exists by reason of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, which prevents the States from interfering with interstate commerce. The Congress, and the Congress only, can remedy this evil. It has the power to prevent the use of the mails for the purpose of advertising the sale of intoxicating liquors in prohibition territory. I believe that for the same reasons that Congress prohibited the use of the mails to the lotteries of the country it should prohibit the use of the mails to advertise the sale of intoxicating liquors in dry States, and hope that such a law will be enacted at this Congress.

I have always favored the enactment of laws by Congress that will prevent the commerce clause of the Constitution being used as a shield to allow the liquor interests in a wet State to defeat the will of the people declared for temperance in a dry State, and hope that the Republican party, in its control of the legislation of this Congress, will no longer block the way to the passage of the bills intended to relieve this situation, but will allow the same to be reported to the House, where we can have a fair vote on them.

Some time ago I wrote a letter expressing my views on this question, which I send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, December 17, 1907.

Rev. J. M. MASON,
Secretary Alabama Conference Methodist Episcopal Church South, Eufaula, Ala.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor, conveying the resolutions passed by the conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, petitioning the Representatives in Congress from Alabama to enact such laws as may be necessary to prevent the introduction of intoxicating liquors into prohibition States and to prevent the issuance of internal-revenue licenses in such States, is received.

I believe that the regulation or prohibition of the sale of liquor is a police power, and the control of it is vested in the State governments, and not in the National Government; but, on account of the commerce clause in the Federal Constitution, unless the Federal Government aids the State government in enforcing its police regulations in reference to the sale of liquor, the States can not prevent the introduction of liquor into prohibition territory. I am now and always have been in favor of enacting the necessary legislation in Congress to enable the States to enforce their own laws.

In the Fifty-seventh Congress, some six years ago, a bill was reported to the House by my colleague from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], known as the "Hepburn-Dolliver bill," the effect of which was to prevent the introduction of liquor from a wet State into a dry State. I voted for this bill along with my other colleagues from Alabama. The bill passed the House and went to the Senate, where it died. In the next Congress a similar bill was again reported by [Mr. CLAYTON] from the Judiciary Committee of the House, but it was never reached on the Calendar. In the last Congress, the Fifty-ninth, a bill was reported in the second session, but was not acted upon by the House. I am in favor of a bill as above described, and should one come up for consideration by the House I will vote for it and do what I can to aid in its passage.

Referring to your second question, to wit, a bill to prevent the issuance of revenue liquor licenses in prohibition States, I think the conference has mistaken the correct remedy in this matter. The United States Government does not license the right to sell liquor, and has not any power to license its sale. It merely taxes liquor when it is sold. Liquor is not sold in prohibition States by reason of a Federal license. The Federal Government merely punishes those who sell without paying the tax. Should we repeal the law requiring a tax to be paid in prohibition States, then there would be no punishment for not paying the tax in prohibition territory, and the object that I believe you have in view would not be accomplished. Again, I do not believe it would be constitutional to pass a bill that levied a tax on one portion of the United States and did not make it uniform throughout the country.

Last winter a subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, of which I was a member, had before it a number of bills on this question. Amongst them was a bill preventing the issuance of special-tax stamps to retail and wholesale dealers in liquors in prohibition districts; also a bill by Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi to amend the internal-revenue laws so as to provide for publicity of its records. We had hearings on these various bills, and among those who appeared before our committee in reference to them was Rev. Edw. S. Dinwiddie, legislative superintendent of the Antisaloon League of America, whose post-office address is Washington, D. C. Mr. Dinwiddie made the following statement:

"A great many people have employed the word 'license' to describe the tax which the Federal Government requires from retail liquor dealers. It is true that this language was used in the original act and often in the debates when the law was passed, over forty years ago, and the word has sometimes been used even in the various Supreme Court decisions which have, at the same time, held that the license confers no authority to sell intoxicating liquors. 'A license,' according to Bouvier's definition, in his law dictionary, 'is a grant by some competent authority to do an act which, without such authorization, would be illegal.'

"As I understand it, the United States Government neither authorizes a man to sell liquor in any of the States, nor could it do so by any specific enactment for that purpose. The regulation of the liquor traffic within the States has been universally held to be under the police powers of the State, and, in addition to this constitutional fact, the act itself specifically says: 'The payment of any tax imposed by the internal-revenue laws for carrying on any trade or business shall not be held to exempt any person from any penalty or punishment provided by the laws of any State for carrying on the same within such State, or in any manner to authorize the commencement or continuance of such trade or business contrary to the laws of such State or in places prohibited by municipal law; nor shall the payment of any such tax be held to prohibit any State from placing a duty or tax on the same trade or business, for State or other purposes.'

"The following decision of the Treasury Department, recorded in volume 2 of the Treasury Decisions, 1899, No. 21851, clearly indicates the view of the Department, as well as the judgment of the courts, that the payment of the United States special tax and the possession of the tax receipt for $25 does not confer any authority whatever upon the possessor to sell liquor contrary to State law. This decision reads as follows: 'Persons who indulge in the sale of alcoholic liquors, even though such business is a violation of the laws of their State, are, nevertheless, required to pay the special tax under the internal-revenue laws of the United States. The stamp, however, issued to them is not a license, and does not protect them from prosecution, conviction, and sentence under the State law.'

"Further, this statement of the nonconferring of authority to sell liquor by the Federal Government is printed in red ink across the face of this special $25 tax receipt. As I understand it, the position of the Federal Government is simply that if a man sells liquor at retail anywhere throughout the United States he is required to pay $25 to the Federal Government as revenue. The Federal Government is not, and, of course, can not be, charged with the enforcement of State or local legislation, but when we consider the nature of our dual Government and the attitude of the States, particularly with reference thereto, it is not asking too much, indeed, it is only asking a fair and proper thing—that the Federal Government should do nothing by legislation or regulations of its Departments to embarrass and thwart the States in the exercise of their police powers, because of the acknowledged delegated powers of Congress to raise revenue upon one hand and regulate interstate commerce upon another.

"It should be borne in mind that under the old Confederation the States had absolutely plenary powers over all these subjects. The intention was not to have the States or the citizens of the States placed in a position where their reserved police powers would be seriously crippled because of their delegation to Congress of certain other powers simply in order to secure uniformity of operation in matters of purely national concern. What we contend for, and what is reasonable to expect between the Federal and State governments in matters of this kind, is what Mr. Justice Johnson in his concurring opinion in the Gibbons v. Ogden case, referring to the difficulty in drawing the line between the police powers of the State governments and the commercial powers of the Federal, called 'A frank and candid cooperation for the general good.'

"In the next place, it seems that many of our friends who advocate the passage of the law to actually forbid the issuance of special-tax receipts in prohibition territory do so upon the supposition that if the parties then continue to sell intoxicating liquors without having paid the tax, the Federal Government will come in and assist the State in exercising its police powers by proceeding against such parties for selling without paying this tax and possessing this tax receipt. In other words, by one law the United States Government is to forbid its officers to receive this special tax and issue its receipt therefor to applicants proposing to retail liquors in territory in which the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited by State or municipal law, and by another Federal law such an applicant is to be prosecuted by the United States Government for selling such liquor without having paid this special tax and possessing the receipt therefor.

"I may be in error about this, but it does not appear to me that the Federal Government will place itself in an attitude of criminally prosecuting a man for failure to pay a tax and possessing a receipt therefor which the officers of the Government itself are forbidden, by another Federal Statute, to receive and issue, respectively. I have serious doubts as to whether it would be possible to convict a man under conditions just named.

"I may be further in error, but I incline strongly to the belief that what is needed to remedy the admitted evils of the present situation throughout our States in connection with the issuance of the special tax receipts is not Federal legislation to prohibit their issuance in prohibition territory so much as a Federal mandate to the proper internal-revenue officers to furnish a certified list of those paying the special tax in certain districts as may be called for by proper State or local officers. * * *

"I may say, in conclusion, that I believe the vast majority of the church and moral forces which I have the honor to represent would prefer that the Federal Government received no revenue from the liquor traffic, believing that it would expedite our contest against the liquor traffic; but until this is done we incline to believe that the certified list which I have mentioned will probably more fully answer the requirements of the States in their endeavor to enforce police regulations than any other method. They can ferret out violators of the law in this way through the records of the revenue department as they would not be able to do were a measure to pass aiming at the entire prohibition of the issuance of such tax receipts in prohibition territory."

From these statements you will see that the representative of the American Antisaloon League did not favor a bill prohibiting the payment of tax for the sale of liquor in prohibition territory, because he believed such a bill would prevent the United States Government from prosecuting those who sold liquor without paying the tax in that territory.

On the other hand, the committee believed that the evil growing out of the issuance of the Government tax was due to the fact that the rules of the Treasury Department prevented the collectors of internal revenue from giving the names of those who paid the tax. Having this in view, the committee recommended the passage of the following bill:

"Public, No. 263.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That chapter 3 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and hereby is, amended in section 3240 so as to read:

"SEC. 3240. Each collector of internal revenue shall, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, place and keep conspicuously in his office for public inspection an alphabetical list of the names of all persons who shall have paid special taxes within his district, and shall state thereon the time, place, and business for which such special taxes shall be paid, and upon application of any prosecuting officer of any State, county, or municipality he shall furnish a certified copy thereof as of a public record, for which a fee of $1 for each 100 words or fraction thereof in the copy or copies so requested may be charged.

"Approved, June 21, 1906."

I favored this bill, and it was passed; it became a law, and is now on the statute books. The report of the committee, in favoring the passage of the bill, was as follows:

"The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the following bills: H. R. 4533, by Mr. HUMPHREYS; H. R. 4452, by Mr. LITTLE; H. R. 8104, by Mr. CLARK of Florida; H. R. 6014, by Mr. BOWIE, and H. R. 8465, by Mr. BOWIE, having had them under consideration, beg leave to report a substitute. Section 3240 of the Revised Statutes reads as follows:

"'SEC. 3240. Each collector of internal revenue shall, under regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, keep and place conspicuously in his office an alphabetical list of the names of all persons who shall have paid special taxes within his district, and shall state thereon the time, place, and business for which such special tax has been paid.'

"A regulation of the Treasury Department in language is as follows:

"'Collectors are hereby prohibited from giving out any special tax records or any copies thereof to private persons or to local officers or to produce such records or copies thereof in a State court, whether in answer to subpœnas duces tecum or otherwise. Whenever such subpœnas shall have been served upon them, they will appear in court and answer thereto and respectfully decline to produce the records called for, on the ground of being prohibited therefrom by the regulations of this Department.'

"The law and Treasury regulations being as just recited, it is contended that violators of the local law in prohibition districts are enabled to escape conviction and punishment because of the difficulty of procuring evidence against them, and that one of the difficulties in the way is the cited Treasury regulation.

"There does not seem to your committee to be any good and sufficient reason why collectors in revenue districts should not furnish certified copies of the lists on view in their office for such uses as they may be put to. They have therefore reported the accompanying bill in lieu of those recited at the beginning of this report."

From the above statement you will see that my position is now, and always has been, in favor of the Congress passing such laws as will enable the State to enforce its laws in reference to the regulation of the liquor traffic.

Very truly, yours, O. W. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. Speaker, the letter just read expresses my views on the subject. I will not now detain the House with an extended debate. I merely wish to call attention to the crying need of legislation along these lines, that the will of the people in favor of temperance in the several States may be fairly and honestly enforced, and the right of local self-government may become a fact and not be a mere figure of speech.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate upon the post-office appropriation bill heretofore agreed to for to-day may be given on Tuesday next in lieu of to-day, which would mean that the general debate on Tuesday would continue at least two hours and thirty minutes or three hours, preceding 3 o'clock, and that at 3 o'clock on Tuesday the reading of the bill be begun.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS MONONGAHELA RIVER.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16749) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania by the Liberty Bridge Company," approved March 2, 1907.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania by the Liberty Bridge Company," approved March 2, 1907, be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from March 15, 1908."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

MANEUVERING GROUND.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 5155, and that it be considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 5155, and that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the Secretary of War shall deem the acquisition of lands in private ownership necessary for the enlargement of the military maneuvering grounds for the United States Army and National Guard within the reservation known as the Crow Creek National Forest, he may certify to the Secretary of the Interior the description of such specific tract or tracts of land as he may deem necessary for such purpose, and the Secretary of the Interior may thereupon, with the approval of the President, exchange therefor an equal area of any of the unoccupied, nonmineral, untimbered public land subject to entry within the State of Wyoming.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this been to a committee of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. This bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. Of the House. Last year a similar bill, including a larger area, was reported from the Committee on the Public Lands. I have also brought the bill to the attention of the Committee on the Public Lands, as it involves the action of the military on one side and of the Department of the Interior on the other, so that it has the approval of the two committees.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has been to the Committee on Military Affairs of this session?

Mr. MONDELL. And reported by them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Unanimously?

Mr. MONDELL. Unanimously, so far as I know.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that last year a similar bill involving all reservations was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and those of the Committee on Military Affairs who at that time inspected the bill or investigated the subject were opposed to passing a general law authorizing it anywhere. They believed if it was proposed to do it in any particular place it ought to stand on its own merits. In this case the railroads have been granted each alternate section. They are now within a reservation of the United States. They are willing to exchange the sections that have been given to them for others outside of the reservation, of the same character of land, no better, no worse, as I understand it, and the Committee on Military Affairs believed it would be a good thing to get the control of all the land within the reservation that is now established by the Government.

Mr. PAYNE. It is necessary for the enlargement of this——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not understand it is absolutely necessary for that, but in firing artillery and all that the private lands are discommoded. And it aids largely in caring for the water supply for the Post D. A. Russell and for the city of Cheyenne.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that it does not enlarge the exterior boundaries of the reservation at all. It simply eliminates from the present boundary the private lands.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the Government always gets the worst of it when it exchanges land.

Mr. MONDELL. These lands are partially timbered, and the lands that are to be taken are untimbered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REPRINT OF BILLS.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill H. R. 17300, entitled "A bill to establish a Department of Labor," and the bill H. R. 408, entitled "A bill to create a Department of Transportation." The supply of these bills has become exhausted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. REDFIELD PROCTOR, late a Senator from the State of Vermont.

Resolved, That a committee of seven Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to take order for arranging the funeral of Mr. PROCTOR.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect his remains be removed from Washington to Proctor, Vt., for burial in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms attended by the committee, who shall have full power to carry these resolutions into effect.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives, and request the House to appoint a committee to act with the committee of the Senate.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senator the Senate do now adjourn.

And that in compliance with the foregoing the Vice-President had appointed as said committee Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. DANIEL, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PERKINS, Mr. TALIAFERRO, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. HEMENWAY.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3409) to extend the time of payments on certain homestead entries in Oklahoma.

DEATH OF HON. REDFIELD PROCTOR.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to announce to the House of Representatives the death of the Hon. REDFIELD PROCTOR, senior Senator from the State of Vermont, who passed from this life to the life eternal a few minutes before 5 o'clock last evening. In a short time I shall ask this House to set apart a day to pay proper tribute to his life, his character, and his distinguished public services. I now send to the Clerk's desk resolutions which I ask to have read and move their adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. REDFIELD PROCTOR, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Vermont.

Resolved, That a committee of six Members of the House of Representatives, with such members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Hon. REDFIELD PROCTOR the House of Representatives do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question will be on agreeing to the resolutions save the last.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HASKINS, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, Mr. LITTLEFIELD, Mr. LAMB, and Mr. SLAYDEN.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the last resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for education of natives of Alaska—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Acting Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for relief of Maj. G. H. Bingham—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Acting Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for relief of certain officers of the United States Army—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of George Leonard, administrator of estate of Catherine Morin, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WEISSE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 18754) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1167), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. COOPER of Texas: A bill (H. R. 18755) authorizing a light station at Sabine Pass, Texas—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. KINKAID: A bill (H. R. 18756) providing for the purchase of a site and erection of a public building in the city of Alliance, State of Nebraska—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. ANDREWS: A bill (H. R. 18757) to authorize the issue of bridge bonds by the county of Valencia, in the Territory of New Mexico—to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. HARDWICK: Resolution (H. Res. 286) calling on the President of the United States for certain information—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WEISSE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: A bill (H. R. 18754) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors—to the Private Calendar.

By Mr. ANDREWS: A bill (H. R. 18758) for the relief of Eduardo Martinez—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 18759) granting an increase of pension to Garrett H. Fowler—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BOOHER: A bill (H. R. 18760) for the relief of David Housel—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BOYD: A bill (H. R. 18761) granting a pension to E. Perrine—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 18762) granting an increase of pension to Alpheus Wright—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FOCHT: A bill (H. R. 18763) granting an increase of pension to Samuel H. Hartman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. DICK. I present a petition from sundry telegraphers, citizens of Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation placing the telegraph systems of the United States under the provisions of certain bills which have been introduced in the Senate and House of Representatives. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD, omitting the names, and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, omitting the names, as follows:

To the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, respectfully petition Congress as follows:

1. To enact legislation placing the telegraph systems of the United States under the provisions of an act whereby in any controversy threatening to interfere with or interrupt the telegraph service the Federal Government shall cause an investigation to be made on request of either party to the controversy. President Roosevelt said, on this subject, in his message to Congress: "The need for some provision for such investigation was forcibly illustrated during the past summer. A strike of telegraph operators seriously interfered with telegraph communication, causing great damage to business interests and serious inconvenience to the general public," etc.

2. To enact legislation compelling telegraph companies to show plainly and accurately on each telegram delivered by them the time such telegram was filed for transmission at the place from whence it came and the time such telegram was received at the office from which it was delivered. (H. R. 15123, H. R. 15267, and S. 4395.)

3. To enact legislation designed to prevent mailing of telegrams by telegraph companies which are accepted for telegraphic transmission. Telegrams were mailed in every State of the Union during the recent telegraphers' strike, and evidence is on file at Washington. (H. R. 15929.)

4. To cause a general investigation of the telegraph companies, especially as to the justifiability of their joint increase in telegraphic rates to the public of 20 per cent to 60 per cent, the reduction of 10 per cent in salaries of employees, and the conduction of their business during the telegraphers' strike. (H. J. Res. 126.)

Mr. PENROSE presented petitions of 1,177 citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation providing additional protection to the dairy interests of the country, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the States of Pennsylvania, Illinois, New Jersey, New York, and Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the salaries at post-office substations, which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of sundry citizens of Illinois, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SALES FOR FUTURE DELIVERY.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a memorial of bankers of the city of Chicago, protesting against the passage of any bills for the modification of the system of selling grain and other commodities for future delivery now in vogue on the principal exchanges of the country. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, with the names attached, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, with the names attached, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

CHICAGO, March 2, 1908.

To the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned bankers of the city of Chicago, emphatically disapproving of the provisions of Senate bill 4298, introduced by Senator GORE, of Oklahoma, and Senate bill 3619, introduced by Senator DAVIS, of Arkansas, or any bills having in view the impairment, or even modification, of the system now in vogue on the principal exchanges of the country of selling grain and other commodities for future delivery, hereby respectfully protest against their passage.

If any such bills should be enacted it would be, in our judgment, well-nigh disastrous to the commercial, agricultural, and financial interests of the country.

We have no hesitation in saying that this system has been and is of incalculable advantage, particularly to the agriculturist, and secures to him the unfettered operation of the law of supply and demand.

It is our firm conviction that such proposed legislation would inflict on the community a loss quite out of proportion to the evils sought to be eradicated thereby.

It would seriously interfere with our making loans on grain or provisions, as we would be deprived of an open, ready, and constant market for these important commodities, which sustain a vital relation, directly and indirectly, to our industrial and commercial life.

We trust that you can consistently use your best efforts to defeat any such proposed legislation.

Banking Company, Oscar T. Foreman, vice-president; The Hibernian Banking Association, by L. B. Clarke, vice-president; Western Trust and Savings Bank, Joseph E. Otis, president; Central Trust Company of Illinois, Charles G. Dawes, president; The Bankers' National Bank of Chicago, J. C. Craft, vice-president.

THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. HALE. I present the memorial of William H. Maxwell, city superintendent of schools, and members of faculties in universities and colleges and educators of New York City, remonstrating against the great addition to the Navy involved in the plan of authorizing at once the construction of four new battle ships. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, with the names, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

To the Representatives and Senators in Congress:

We, the undersigned members of faculties in universities and colleges and educators of New York City, voicing, as we believe, the sentiments of many thousands of American citizens, earnestly protest against the extravagant demand for an addition of over $60,000,000 in the form of four new battle ships, cruisers, etc., to the naval budget of last year, inasmuch as no danger threatens the country not known last April when President Roosevelt told the world: "We are no longer enlarging our Navy. We are simply keeping up its strength. The addition of one battle ship a year barely enables us to make good the units which become obsolete."

Sixty-five per cent of the national income is now expended on war, past and present. The increase of our naval budget has recently been used in the French Assembly as a reason for increasing its own; is largely responsible for the increase of armaments among Asiatic nations, and is well-nigh certain to retard that reduction in the armaments of the world for which we have so long been waiting.

The growing discontent throughout the world at the appalling increase of waste of national resources must be heeded. We feel that this protest is the more necessary, inasmuch as there are various new and effective methods now available for promoting international friendship and rationally settling difficulties which these new demands seem to ignore.

ENROLLMENT OF CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

Mr. TELLER. I present the petition signed by Hon. Henry W. Blair and a large number of Indians in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nation, praying for the enrollment of all such descendants born or who shall be born after the approved enrollment until the National Government's and tribal existence shall be terminated, and for other purposes.

The petitioners have asked me to have the petition inserted in the RECORD. I do not think it is wise to lumber up the RECORD with these petitions, but, as a matter of considerable interest to a large portion of new-made citizens, I move that the petition be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF PARCELS-POST SYSTEM.

Mr. BURNHAM. I present a letter from the Postmaster-General containing certain data relative to the proposed extension of the parcels-post, with exhibits on the same subject. I move that the letter, with the exhibits, be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask that the letter and exhibits be also printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and exhibits were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1908.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It affords me great pleasure, in compliance with your request, to place at your disposal the data which are available relative to the proposed extension of the parcel post.

It does not appear to be generally appreciated that a comprehensive system of parcel post is already in satisfactory operation in most foreign countries. Exhibit 1 gives detailed information on this subject. I show here the limit of weight which has been fixed in a number of instances:

Great Britain, 11 pounds; Germany, 110 pounds; France, 22 pounds; Italy, 11 pounds; Chile, 11 pounds; New Zealand, 11 pounds; Austria, 110 pounds; Belgium, 132 pounds; The Netherlands, 11 pounds; Cuba, 11 pounds.

The rates in the countries mentioned are much lower than those shown in Exhibit 2, which have been recommended for the general parcel post in the United States.

The present rate on the general parcel post is 16 cents a pound for people in our own country, the limit of weight being 4 pounds, while the rate from the United States to 29 foreign countries is 12 cents a pound and the limit of weight to 24 of these countries is 11 pounds. In other words, our own people must pay 4 cents a pound more for the privilege of dispatching packages to each other than when destined to residents of a foreign country. I have therefore urged a rate of 12 cents a pound for packages forwarded through the mails to post-offices in the United States and its possessions, subject to the same regulations as exist at the present time, with the exception of increasing the weight limit to 11 pounds. The service can be rendered at a cost well within the rates recommended.

According to the Report of the Record of Weight of Second-class Mail Matter, transmitted by the Post-Office Department to the House of Representatives under date of February 1, 1907, the average haul of all second-class matter was 540 miles.

Of the total receipts of the Post-Office Department, 69 per cent are expended for labor and supplies and 7 per cent for conveyance charges other than those paid the railroads for transporting the mail. A general rate for parcel post of 12 cents a pound would produce a revenue of $240 a ton. Even on the basis of a 540-mile average haul I find the debit and credit sides of 1 ton of parcel post to be as follows:

By postage		$240.00
To railroad transportation, 540 miles, at 5½ cents	$29.70
Other transportation charges	16.80
Labor and supplies	165.60
Total cost		212.10
Profit		27.90

A local parcel post confined to rural-delivery routes is also advocated at the rates given in Exhibit No. 3. The Department favors the establishment of this special service because of its ability to render it with great advantage to the farmer, the country merchant, and other patrons of the routes, as the necessary machinery—over 38,000 routes now regularly covered by rural carriers—is in operation. There are some fifteen millions of people living on these routes, which shows the vast possibilities of the rural service. It has been estimated that if but three packages of the maximum weight were handled each trip on the rural routes now established, the resulting revenue, even at the low rates given, would more than wipe out the postal deficit. The increased cancellations would automatically advance the salaries of postmasters of the fourth class and the remaining revenue, which would be clear gain, would be of great assistance in making the rural service self-sustaining. The rural service will in all probability cost the Government this year $34,000,000, an increase of $10,000,000 over last year.

The history and advantages of the rural delivery should be understood by our people. There is a feeling in many quarters that it is an extravagance and an unnecessary drain upon the postal revenues. The first rural route was established in the latter part of 1896, $14,840 being expended for rural delivery during that fiscal year. At that time the postal deficit was $11,411,779. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, the expenditures for rural delivery aggregated $26,671,699, while the postal deficit showed a decrease, as compared with 1897, of $4,800,000, the deficit amounting to $6,653,282. This would seem to show that while the expense incurred for maintaining rural delivery is great, yet the rural delivery has been instrumental in increasing the general postal receipts. However, its benefits to our people can not be measured in dollars and cents.

That a local parcel post would be of material advantage to the retail merchant in competition with mail-order houses is seen at once, when it is pointed out that the latter, at the proposed general parcel-post rate of 12 cents a pound, would be obliged to pay $1.32 for sending an 11-pound package to a rural route patron, a difference in favor of the local storekeeper of about 10 cents a pound, or $1.07 on an 11-pound package.

Letters and petitions for the extension of the parcel post are being received from all sections of the country. Many commercial bodies formerly opposed to any action of this kind are on record as being heartily in favor of it.

On the other hand, objections have been raised to the measures the Department is advocating. Although no sound argument has been advanced in opposition, the contentions which have been made are not without interest. I mention the more important of them, at the same time giving the replies which they have elicited:

It has been stated that the Department is not equipped to deliver 11-pound parcels received in the general mails. The present postal regulations provide that where a package is of undue size or weight a formal notice shall be sent the addressee requesting him to call for it. This practice would continue were the weight limit increased to 11 pounds, in the case of offices having free delivery. Nor would it work a hardship, for under the present limit of 4 pounds the average weight of parcels sent through the mails is but one-third of a pound. Increasing the weight limit would not have nearly as great an effect on the average weight of parcels mailed as seems to be commonly supposed. Where packages were addressed to persons living on rural routes they would, of course, be delivered to the boxes of the patrons by rural carriers, who would not thereby be inconvenienced.

The claim that the special local rate recommended for the parcel post on rural routes would eventually be extended to include the entire postal service has been given considerable publicity. The impossibility of this becomes apparent when attention is directed to the cost of railroad transportation, which has no part in the former service. About $45,000,000 was paid last year for mail transportation and $6,000,000 for postal cars.

Others have said that large mail-order houses would, under the proposed law, utilize the special parcel post on rural routes through agents, to the great disadvantage of the country merchant, first assembling their orders and dispatching them by express or freight to suitable distributing points. The Department has recommended provisions which will prevent any such use of the routes. It should be remembered, too, that, even in the absence of a specific prohibition of this nature, any systematic attempt upon the part of a mail-order house to thus distribute its wares would necessitate the employment of many thousands of local representatives. The catalogues of these concerns indicate in no uncertain way that they attribute their success, in large measure, to their low selling expense, and that the absence of any sort of agents is the principal feature of their argument in accounting for the supposedly low prices of their goods.

The cry of "class legislation" has been raised. There is, of course, no discrimination involved, for all who can be reached by rural carriers will be accommodated. It would be as reasonable to decry the laws which permit the delivery of mail to patrons living on rural routes, while persons differently situated are obliged to make a trip to a near-by post-office to obtain their letters.

Those who claim than an increase in the weight limit would work an injury to country merchants appear to have the impression that mail-order houses now deliver their goods extensively through the postal service, and that this practice would largely increase if the recommendations which have been made become law. Upon a moment's reflection it will be perceived that the present rate of 16 cents a pound ($16 per hundredweight), as well as the proposed rate of 12 cents a pound ($12 per hundredweight), are alike prohibitive on practically all lines of merchandise. Mail-order houses make their shipments usually by freight or express and would continue to do so.

Antagonism to the proposed measures, when analyzed and found not to be the result of selfish motives, appears to be based upon inaccurate or insufficient information. In illustration I desire to invite attention to a communication of the Richmond Commercial Club, of Richmond, Ind., which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 4, 1908. In this letter the statement was made that a certain mail-order house would save $40,000 a year on the mailing of catalogues alone. Catalogues are rated as third-class matter, whereas the Department's recommendations with respect to parcels post relate to fourth-class matter only. Catalogues are now mailable at 1 cent for 2 ounces, or 8 cents a pound, 4 cents a pound less than the rate proposed for the general parcels post. The mail-order house referred to, therefore, would gain nothing under the proposed law in the mailing of its catalogues.

With the adoption of new conveniences of life by urban residents, and the ever-increasing attractions of the city, especially potent in their influence upon the younger generation, the importance of affording farmers and ruralites generally every legitimate advantage becomes more and more apparent. The free rural delivery has improved materially and intellectually the life of great numbers of these people. Is it too much to ask that the Department shall make a further use of this important system, a use which, while adding appreciably to the postal revenues, will directly and vitally benefit every man, woman, and child within reach of a rural route? The countryman would have the necessities of life delivered at his gate at an average cost of 2 cents a pound, thereby facilitating and increasing consumption. This would mean augmentation of the trade of thousands of country merchants. The commercial traveler should appreciate the advantages of this system; it would increase his orders, because the country merchant buys from the jobber or the wholesaler. Every component part of our commercial system would feel the effects of an increased prosperity.

It would inevitably tend toward the improvement of the roads. Better roads and improved postal facilities in the rural districts would result in increased values of farm lands. The rural service as now organized has accomplished something in this direction; its enlargement will add to the good attained.

Believe me, faithfully, yours, G. VON L. MEYER.

Hon. HENRY E. BURNHAM,
United States Senate, Washington.

Parcels-post rates in the domestic service of the countries named.

Great Britain.—Postage rates for the first pound, 3 pence (6 cents), and for each additional pound, 1 penny (2 cents); maximum weight, 11 pounds; greatest length, 3 feet 6 inches; greatest length and girth combined, 6 feet.

New Zealand and the states composing the Commonwealth of Australia.—Limits of weight and size, same as in Great Britain. Postage rates, 6 pence (12 cents) for the first pound and 3 pence (6 cents) for each additional pound.

Germany.—Greatest weight, 50 kilograms (about 110 pounds); no limit of size. Postage rates: For all parcels conveyed not more than 10 geographic miles, 25 pfennig (6 cents), and 50 pfennig (13 cents) for greater distance; if a parcel weighs more than 5 kilograms (11 pounds avoirdupois) it is charged for each additional kilogram (2 pounds) carried 10 miles, 5 pfennig (1 cent); 20 miles, 10 pfennig (3 cents); 50 miles, 20 pfennig (5 cents); 100 miles, 30 pfennig (8 cents); 150 miles, 40 pfennig (10 cents); and more than 150 miles, 50 pfennig (13 cents). Unwieldy parcels are charged, in addition, 50 per cent of the above rates.

Austria.—Greatest weight, 50 kilograms (110 pounds), except that parcels containing gold or silver coin may weigh up to 65 kilograms (143 pounds). Postage rates: Parcels up to 5 kilograms (11 pounds) in weight are charged 30 heller (6 cents) for the first 10 miles, and 60 heller (12 cents) for greater distances. A parcel weighing more than 5 kilograms (11 pounds) is charged for each kilogram (2 pounds), in addition to the above rates, for the first 10 miles, 6 heller (1 cent); 20 miles, 12 heller (2 cents); 50 miles, 24 heller (5 cents); 100 miles, 36 heller (7 cents); 150 miles, 48 heller (10 cents); and more than 150 miles, 60 heller (12 cents).

France.—Greatest weight, 10 kilograms (about 22 pounds); no limit of size. Postage rates: Up to 3 kilograms (7 pounds), 60 centimes (12 cents) delivered at the railway station, and 85 centimes (17 cents) delivered at a residence; from 3 to 5 kilograms (7 to 11 pounds), 80 centimes (16 cents) at a station, and 1 franc 5 centimes (21 cents) at residence; from 5 to 10 kilograms (11 to 22 pounds), 1 franc 25 centimes (25 cents) at a station, and 1 franc 50 centimes (30 cents) at a residence.

Belgium.—Greatest weight 60 kilograms (about 132 pounds); no limit of size, but unwieldy parcels are charged 50 per cent in addition to the following rates for any distance: Parcels up to 5 kilograms (11 pounds), 50 centimes (10 cents), or if by express trains, 80 centimes (16 cents); up to 10 kilograms (22 pounds), 60 centimes (12 cents); or if by express trains, 1 franc (20 cents); for each additional 10 kilograms (22 pounds), 10 centimes (2 cents); or if sent by express trains, 50 centimes (10 cents) additional. Fee for delivering at residences, 30 centimes (6 cents).

Italy.—Greatest weight, 5 kilograms (11 pounds). For ordinary parcels, greatest size in any direction, 60 centimeters (2 feet), except rolls, which may measure 1 meter (40 inches—3 feet 4 inches) in length by 20 centimeters (8 inches) in thickness. Postage rates for a parcel not exceeding 3 kilograms (7 pounds), 60 centimes (12 cents), and 1 franc (20 cents) for a parcel exceeding that weight. A parcel which exceeds 60 centimeters (2 feet) in any direction, but does not exceed 1½ meters (5 feet), is admitted to the mails as an "unwieldy" parcels, and is charged, in addition to the above rates, 30 centimes (6 cents) if it does not weigh more than 3 kilograms (7 pounds), and 50 centimes (10 cents) if it exceeds that weight.

The Netherlands.—Greatest weight, 5 kilograms (11 pounds); greatest size, 25 cubic decimeters (1,525 cubic inches), or 1 meter (3 feet 4 inches) in any direction. Postage rates: Fifteen (6) cents (Dutch) up to 1 kilogram (2 pounds); 20 (8) cents from 1 to 3 kilograms (2 to 7 pounds); 25 (10) cents from 3 to 5 kilograms (7 to 11 pounds).

Chile.—Greatest weight, 5 kilograms (11 pounds); must not measure more than 60 centimeters (2 feet) in any direction. Postage rates: Thirty centavos (10 cents) if a parcel does not weigh more than 3 kilograms (7 pounds); 50 centavos (17 cents) if it weighs more.

Cuba.—Greatest weight, 11 pounds; greatest size, 3 feet 6 inches in length by 2 feet 6 inches in width. Postage rate: Ten centavos (10 cents) a pound up to 5 pounds; and 6 centavos (6 cents) for each additional pound.

[S. 5115, Sixtieth Congress, first session. In the Senate of the United States, February 10, 1908.]

Mr. KEAN introduced the following bill, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

A bill to increase the limit of weight of fourth-class mail matter, to amend the postage rates chargeable thereon, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That parcels of merchandise or other matter not embraced in the first, second, or third class of mail matter, and not exceeding 11 pounds in weight, shall, subject to the provisions of existing law governing matter of the fourth class, except as hereby amended, be admitted to the mails as such matter at the following rates of postage: One ounce, 1 cent; over 1 ounce and not exceeding 3 ounces, 2 cents; over 3 ounces and not exceeding 4 ounces, 3 cents; over 4 ounces and not exceeding 5 ounces, 4 cents; over 5 ounces and not exceeding 6 ounces, 5 cents; over 6 ounces and not exceeding 8 ounces, 6 cents; over 8 ounces and not exceeding 12 ounces, 9 cents; and over 12 ounces and not exceeding 16 ounces, 12 cents.

EXHIBIT 5.

[S. 4122, Sixtieth Congress, first session. In the Senate of the United States, February 10, 1908.]

Mr. BURNHAM introduced the following bill, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

A bill to provide a rural delivery parcel post for merchandise and other articles mailed on rural delivery routes, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General is authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to establish a domestic rural parcel post at special rates of postage, for the delivery on rural delivery routes of foodstuffs (including groceries, provisions, meats, fruits, and vegetables), dry goods, drugs, books, and other merchandise, unless the same shall be unmailable under this act or any other act as hereby amended.

SEC. 2. That such special rates of postage on such parcels of merchandise shall be 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pound or fractional part thereof, and on parcels weighing less than 1 pound as follows: Two ounces or less, 1 cent; over 2 ounces and not exceeding 4 ounces, 2 cents; over 4 ounces and not exceeding 8 ounces, 3 cents; over 8 ounces and not exceeding 12 ounces, 4 cents, and over 12 ounces and not exceeding 1 pound, 5 cents: Provided, That such postage shall be prepaid by ordinary postage stamps affixed to such parcels, and that the character of such matter shall be indicated by the words "Rural Parcel Post," stamped on each of such parcels by the postmaster or rural carrier receiving it: Provided further, That the establishment of such rural parcel post and special postage rates shall not in any wise affect the mailing of or postage rate on packages of third and fourth class matter, except within the limitations stated: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be taken as authorizing the acceptance or delivery at the special rates of postage herein provided of any parcel offered by any person acting as agent or representative, upon commission or otherwise, for any person or company not resident on such rural delivery route: And provided further, That only such parcels shall be received for delivery at the special rates of postage herein provided as are offered by bona fide merchants or dealers whose regular places of business are on rural delivery routes covered by this act, in the ordinary and regular course of their business, and by residents on such routes in their individual capacity.

SEC. 3. That parcels covered by said special postage rates and deliverable by said rural parcel post under this act shall not exceed 11 pounds in weight, 3 feet 6 inches in length, or 6 feet in length and girth combined, and such parcels shall conform to the Postal Laws and Regulations concerning mailability, except as they are modified by this act and regulations promulgated in pursuance thereof.

SEC. 4. That perishable articles of food submitted for mailing under said rural parcel post shall not be accepted by postmasters or rural delivery carriers more than three hours before the departure of the mail, and then only at the risk of the sender, and the postmaster or rural carrier shall stamp or note on any such parcels the time of acceptance and of transmittal, and the words "At the sender's risk."

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall apply only to parcels mailed on and addressed to rural delivery routes, as follows:

(1) From the post-office or station from which one or more rural delivery routes emanate to any intermediate post-office or to any patron on any of said routes emanating from said post-office or station and supplied by rural carrier.

(2) From any intermediate post-office on any rural delivery route to the post-office or station from which said route emanates, or to any intermediate post-office, or to any patron on that or any other rural route emanating from said post-office or station and supplied by rural carrier.

(3) From any patron on any rural delivery route to the post-office or station from which said route emanates, or to any patron or intermediate post-office on that or any other rural delivery route emanating from said post-office or station and supplied by rural carrier: Provided, That in all cases where, under this act, parcels are mailed at a post-office on a rural route which emanates from a station of such post-office, such parcels shall be offered for mailing at such station; and in all cases where parcels mailed under this act are addressed to a post-office on a rural route terminating at a station of such post-office, such parcels shall be delivered to addressees at such station, and in the later case addressees shall call or send for such parcels.

SEC. 6. That the proviso in the act of April 28, 1904, chapter 1759 (33 Stats., p. 440), relative to the transportation of merchandise by rural carriers for patrons, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. That seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants, when mailed under this act, shall be chargeable with the postage rates and subject to the limit of weight herein provided.

SEC. 8. That all provisions of law applicable to the third and fourth classes of mail matter, and all provisions of law applicable generally to mail matter, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby extended and made applicable to matter of like character mailable under this act: Provided, That matter so mailable shall be subject to the rates of postage and the limitation of weight herein provided.

MEYER WILL WAGE ACTIVE CAMPAIGN FOR PARCELS POST—HAS STARTED MACHINERY FOR HIS REFORM, AND WILL MAKE GREAT EFFORT TO ROUSE AND EDUCATE PUBLIC SENTIMENT IN ITS FAVOR BEFORE CONGRESS CONVENES—AMERICA SHOULD CATCH UP WITH PROCESSION—TALKS ABOUT PLANS FOR THE HERALD—RÉSUMÉ OF THE OPERATION OF SYSTEM IN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES, THE COST OF TRANSPORTATION, AND BENEFITS WHICH ACCRUE.

[By Ernest G. Walker.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 13, 1907.

Postmaster-General George von L. Meyer, in his speech at Boston Saturday upon his plan for a parcels post, has started the machinery for his reform with all the acumen of an old campaigner. He is going to put the matter squarely up to the people before Congress comes on the scene.

Quick and cheap transport for more of the innumerable small packages that Americans have to exchange is to be the dominant issue of a good business administration of the Post-Office Department. By and by Mr. Meyer is going out to make more speeches at places where they will do the most good for the cause. He wants to arouse and educate public sentiment.

The parcels post is not an exceedingly attractive subject to everybody. Probably hundreds of thousands of people who patronize the United States mails have never thought seriously about what a parcels post is, although it enters tremendously into the domestic, commercial, and industrial economics of the world. It is a vehicle for the carriage of billions of dollars of values annually. Admittedly the United States is far behind the procession. And yet the readiness with which a few pounds of a given article can be moved from Washington to Boston, or from town to town between the two great oceans, means a vast deal to the convenience as well as to the pocketbooks of a great number of people.

European countries employ the machinery of the posts in this herculean task. Many years ago they went far beyond the transmission of information through the mails and utilized the service for the transmission of materials. The United States has been doing the same thing since 1863, but only to a limited degree. Mr. Meyer now wants this country to catch up a little.

WILL HAVE BILL DRAWN.

That is why he is trying to awaken the people to what he wants. He expects to speak in Philadelphia, Chicago, and other cities about the parcels posts, and by the time Congress is here will have a bill drawn. It will be introduced early in December and will cover the changes the Postmaster-General intends recommending in his annual report. These will be the admission to the mails of parcels of a maximum weight of 11 pounds, at 12 cents a pound (4 pounds is now the maximum, at 16 cents a pound), and a local service on rural delivery routes at 5 cents a pound, with 2 cents for every additional pound up to 11. This local service will be confined to each rural route and can not be extended beyond it. Mr. Meyer believes this, if adopted, will make the rural delivery of mail self-sustaining, and the postal service, as a whole, would probably yield a surplus.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker first actively urged the establishment of a parcels post on a large scale. He summed up the situation epigrammatically in his 100 reasons for it and only four reasons against it—those four being the express companies. Others after him, especially the late Postmaster-General Bissell, made like recommendations. But Mr. Meyer now has an advantage in his campaign, which none of his predecessors had in the rural-delivery routes. Every one of the many thousands of routes would be a little parcels service in itself, aside from being a line of communication by which small packages could be conveyed from all parts of the country or to any part of the country. Mr. Meyer is building much upon that fact. The local service at cheaper rates will also protect the local storekeepers, to which the big department stores and mail-order establishments are bogeys.

ASKS NO RADICAL STEP.

If he can carry his recommendations through and persuade Congress to enact them into law, it may be that he will have effected a greater advantage to the country than is likely to follow from any other transportation statute of the last decade. Parcels-post enthusiasts at least think so, drawing their conclusions from observations of the service in Europe.

"I shall not urge any radical step," said the Postmaster-General recently in explaining his plans. "I only want the present service extended toward such a domestic parcels post as we already have by postal treaties with a number of foreign countries. A service that the Government gives its own people with those abroad is none too good for us at home.

"The extension proposed would enable the Department to ascertain how far we can safely go, and also to adapt itself gradually to new requirements. It is a large business proposition. We do not know how much additional equipment would be needed eventually. Probably the equipment on the rural routes would be nearly adequate for the local and general parcels service. In the cities it might be otherwise. But by making a comparatively small extension of the service we could determine whether it would be advisable to go further. I shall only indicate in my annual report a belief that the establishment of a local parcels service in the big cities would be advisable, but shall not urge the incorporation of that feature into law at present.

"I anticipate opposition to this improvement of the postal service, but I believe it will not be influential after the details have been explained. I regard the apprehensions of the small storekeepers as without foundation. That has been the case in European countries, where the same kind of opposition has shown itself at times. The local service on the rural routes at lower rates will give the local dealers an advantage."

SEEKS EXPERTS' VIEWS.

Postmaster-General Meyer is taking pains to collect the opinions of postal experts on his recommendations. He will have the views of a large number of postmasters long before Congress convenes. They are being invited to present whatever objections they may see and also to offer practical suggestions.

Ever since he announced his intention of urging a better parcels-post service for the United States the Postmaster-General has been the recipient of many letters. These come from various classes of people. Most of them commend his plan, but the retail associations, such as the associations of hardware men and grocers, come out in bold opposition. It is such people as these that the Postmaster-General hopes to convert when they are brought to understand the details of what he wants to do. Some of these critics, besides claiming that the legislation would favor the catalogue houses, argue that the Government should not go into a general freight business, and that if the express companies are charging exorbitant rates, the Interstate Commerce Commission, which now has authority over them, should step in and require that the rates be lowered.

The operations of parcels posts in other countries make a very interesting transportation chapter. They are conducted on a gigantic scale, and, apart from what J. Henniker Heaton, long an English member of Parliament from Canterbury, and a great advocate of postal reforms, calls "grandmotherly regulations," have worked with practically world-wide success. Shopping by mail is made easy, whether one in the country would trade with the local draper or the big metropolitan merchant.

FACILITATED BY TELEPHONE.

An extension of parcels posts in the United States would be enormously facilitated, as the matter is viewed at the Post-Office Department, by the prevalence of telephones. Farmers and culturists now have them the country over. Telephone wires have followed in the wake of the rural free-delivery wagon. The postage is now too expensive and the limit of the package too small. But instead of a 4-pound package for 16 cents, let there be a 11-pound package for 25 cents and the rural routes will do a rushing business. Rural patrons will telephone to town for half the things they want—for hardware, groceries, and dry goods—and in turn will be sending to town butter, cheese, eggs, and vegetables. A great saving of time in many branches of industry will be possible under the general extension that Mr. Meyer wants. It would be a boon to manufacturers of a great variety of small articles. The Postmaster-General refuses to consider whether this would injure the express companies. He approaches the matter purely as a parcels-post extension that should give postal patrons a quicker and cheaper service.

Great Britain's conservative enactments will likely be a model for any extension of the parcels-post service by Congress. The service is almost twenty-five years old over there. It has become one of the most important and highly appreciated postal features. Its growth has been continuous and phenomenal. The scope has frequently been broadened. There was an early clamor for an agricultural parcels post. The owners of small farms in remote localities wanted it. The growers of spring flowers in Kerry said it would enable them to compete with the south of France and the Scilly Isles. Eventually the agricultural parcels post was authorized and also spacious dimensions for packages. Flower growers can now send full-length orchids and long-stemmed roses by post, where formerly only simple blooms were admissible.

SEND FISH, EGGS, AND FRUIT.

The produce of the culturists goes forward to London and other big English cities in tremendous volume. Fresh fish, dispatched from seaport towns to the large hotels, are delivered with celerity. Meats, cheese, fruits, vegetables, and freshly laid eggs in mail packages under the 11-pound limit form a very considerable factor in the commerce of the Kingdom.

The general rates are low. A 1-pound parcel takes a 3-penny stamp. That is 6 cents in our money. For 2 pounds an 8-cent stamp is required; for 3 pounds, a 10-cent stamp; for 5 pounds, 12 cents; for 7 pounds, 14 cents; 8 pounds, 16 cents; 9 pounds, 18 cents; 10 pounds, 20 cents, and 11 pounds, 22 cents. Four-pound parcels cost as much as 5 pounds, and 6 pounds cost as much as 7 pounds. For inland parcels 3 feet 6 inches is the maximum length; 6 feet the maximum measurement for length and girth. These have been adopted as standard dimensions in the services of numerous other countries. Parcels should not be posted at a letter box, but presented at the counter of a post-office. The Government virtually guarantees the sender against loss up to $10. Payment of a registry fee of 4 cents, in addition to the regular postage, insures the parcel for $25; a 25-cent registry stamp carries an insurance of $1,000. There have been demands, not yet conceded, for the cash on delivery system that several European countries have adopted.

The big retail stores of London avail themselves extensively of the parcels service for delivery of goods. The rates, ranging from 6 to 22 cents, are not prohibitive. In many cases the Government service is cheaper and quicker. Laundries return washing by parcels post. In Germany, where the rates are even cheaper, lads away at school send their soiled linen home by mail to be washed, and it is returned to them by the same conveyance.

POSTED LIVE BABY.

Many curiosities, as well as staple articles of trade and foodstuffs, are carried in British parcels. A live baby, it is said, was posted in London not long ago and promptly delivered at its destination. A mouse was brought all the way from India, where the parcels post has been developed much more than in England. Several kinds of live animals, including bees, are accepted, if "properly packed."

Sydney Buxton, the postmaster-general of Great Britain, in his last report, statistically demonstrates the continuous growth, and consequently the popularity, of the parcels post in the United Kingdom. The number of parcels delivered in the country districts of England and Wales in 1896–97 was 41,512,000, and increased annually by from 3 to 6 per cent, till in 1905–6 the number was 66,277,000. In the London district for the same ten-year period the increase was from 11,229,000 parcels to 18,167,000. A similar increase was shown for Scotland from 6,802,000 to 10,725,000 parcels, and for Ireland, where the increase was from 4,172,000 in 1896–97 to 6,513,000 in 1905–6.

The gross amount of revenue the Government collected increased from £1,445,126 for 63,715,000 parcels in the United Kingdom the first year of the decade to £2,138,673 for 101,682,000 parcels in the last year of the decade. The post-office's share of these collections increased from £763,307 to £1,142,224. The average postage per parcel decreased during the period from about 11 cents to 10 cents. The postmaster-general undertakes to deliver both letters and parcels at every house in the Kingdom. They are delivered by the same postman, except in the large towns, where there is a special staff for parcel work.

CALL SWISS SERVICE BEST.

Because of competition from private agencies, that have charges graduated on a basis of distance, there is a tendency for an unduly high proportion of long-distance parcels and parcels for delivery in rural districts, which are the least remunerative. The post-office has met this competition by establishing, for comparatively short distances, a large number of horse and motor parcel van services, as road conveyance for these distances makes possible an economy as compared with conveyance by railway at the charge of 55 per cent of the receipts.

The Swiss service is cited much as one of the most efficient and satisfactory in Europe. The mountain villages and resorts of that industrious little country receive a large portion of their supplies by post, as a maximum weight of 110 pounds is carried within a radius of 62 miles. The conditions there are somewhat the same as with the dwellers in the Appalachian and Blue Ridge mountains, to whom it has been declared that a parcels post would be a great boon, because there is no prospect that either the railroads or the express companies will ever approach their hamlets and villages.

This Swiss law includes an agricultural parcels post and likewise a passenger post, agitation for both of which has generally followed the establishment of parcels post in most countries. The passenger post of Switzerland is something like the mail coaches in the United States before the coming of railroads, except that the coaches are owned by the State and the fees are prescribed by the same authority. A very large business is done in sending parcels through the mails. A Treasury official, who was traveling in Switzerland during the past summer, saw at one railroad station several enormous baskets filled with hams and provisions. They were samples of mail parcels under the 110-pound limit.

CASH-ON-DELIVERY PLAN.

The general rates are more liberal than in any other country. A parcel weighing 1 pound is carried anywhere within the boundaries of the Federation for 3 cents, a 5-pound parcel for 5 cents, a 11-pound parcel for 8 cents, a 22-pound parcel for 17 cents, a 33-pound parcel for 23 cents, and a 44-pound parcel for 33 cents. Parcels weighing as much as 110 pounds are carried within a radius of 62 miles for 60 cents, which enables many of the peasants to market much of their light produce by mail. The rates are so adjustable that housewives can secure anything by post from a paper of pins to a bag of flour. The V. P., or value payable, system is a part of the Swiss postal arrangements, so that the purchaser can pay for his goods on delivery, and there is but one financial transaction connected with the purchase as far as he is concerned. A provision for delivery makes the service all the more attractive.

Belgium's parcels post has even a higher-weight limit than Switzerland, for it accepts articles of 62 kilograms, or about 132 pounds, in one package, and puts no limit upon the size, except that unwieldy packages are subject to an extra charge of 50 per cent. But up to 5 kilograms, which is the conventional 11-pound limit of a majority of the parcels-post countries, the charge is 50 centimes, or 10 cents; for 10 kilograms 12 cents, and 2 cents extra for every additional 10 kilograms (22 pounds). A higher charge is made in Belgium, as in several other European countries, if the parcel is to be carried on an express train. It amounts to 6 cents for 5 kilograms. The fee for delivering at residences is 6 cents additional.

Germany and Austria maintain the 50-kilogram limit. The first-named country enforces the 50 per cent extra charge for unwieldy articles. It also has what is called the "zone system." For conveyance 10 geographic miles the charge is 6 cents (25 pfennigs) and 13 cents (50 pfennigs) for greater distances. If the parcel weighs more than 11 pounds, there is a charge of 1 cent (five pfennigs) for each additional kilogram carried 10 miles, 10 pfennigs for 20 miles, 20 pfennigs for 50 miles, 30 pfennigs for 100 miles, 40 pfennigs for 150 miles, and 50 pfennigs, approximately 13 cents, for more than 150 miles. The same rate of charges applies in Austria.

A TABLE OF CHARGES.

The French parcels-post law requires presentation at the railroad station. Some other European countries, like Great Britain, require it to be delivered at the post-office. The French maximum weight is 10 kilograms (22 pounds) without any restriction as to size. The postage rates are 12 cents up to 3 kilograms; 16 cents up to 5 kilograms, and 30 cents up to 10 kilograms. These rates are for delivery at a railroad station. An extra fee of 25 centimes (5 cents) is charged for delivering the parcel at the residence of the addressee.

A table of the parcels-post charges of several countries follows: It shows the maximum weight carried, the minimum charge collected, and also the charge for an 11-pound package, the limit for many of the parcels-post countries.

	Maximum weight of parcel.	Minimum charge for a parcel.	Charge for 11 pounds.
Australia	11	$0.12	$0.72
Austria	110	.06	.12
Belgium	132	.10	.16
Chile	11	.10	.17
Cuba	11	.10	.46
France	22	.12	.16
Germany	110	.03	.13
Great Britain	11	.03	.22
Italy	11	.12	.20
Switzerland	110	.03	.08
The Netherlands	11	.03	.10
United States	4	.01	1.32

Certain of the figures in the table are only approximately correct. The 11-pound rate for a Belgium parcel, for instance, is put down at 16 cents, as that is the rate for carriage by express train, which, perhaps, more nearly compares with mail trains in the United States. By slow train 11 pounds go for 10 cents. Perhaps, also, an extra charge of 6 cents for delivery should be counted in the Belgium figures for purposes of fair comparison, because much of the mail in the United States is delivered.

AVERAGE DISTANCE GREATER HERE.

In the figures for the United States it should be borne in mind that the minimum charge of 1 cent is for an ounce, and that the rate of 16 cents a pound, which it amounts to, might be better for a comparative table; also, that it is impossible to send 11-pound parcels by mail in the United States, except when they are to go abroad to certain countries, with which parcels-post conventions have been concluded.

In a general way the table indicates that the cost in Great Britain or the Continent for sending an 11-pound parcel is in the vicinity of 20 cents. The minimum charge is sometimes for a pound, as in the case of Great Britain, and sometimes for several pounds, as 11 pounds for 10 miles in the case of Germany; or up to 7 pounds, as in the case of Italy. The great disparity in rates is apparent, as is the fact that Mr. Meyer's proposition of a 12-cent per pound rate is comparatively very high.

Certain elementary items of cost enter into the service of European countries that would not be identical with the maintenance of a similar service in the United States. In Germany a considerable mileage of the railroads are State owned. They carry certain parcels in the mails without compensation. In large sections of Europe there has never been anything like adequate service by express companies, and in the absence of business enterprises in establishing such transportation the people have been compelled to look to their governments for relief. The cheap rates for parcels post there were originally, in some part, intended as an accommodation for the poorer classes.

The distances for transportation are less and the population is denser. The United States is 225 times larger than Switzerland, 60 times larger than England, 17 times larger than Germany, 12 times larger than the three countries combined. In England the average distance a letter or mail package travels is 40 miles; in Germany it is 42 miles; in the United States it is said to be 542 miles.

DIFFICULT TO ESTIMATE COST.

No accurate information is available as to whether the European parcels posts are in reality self-supporting. They certainly are nearly so and, in some instances, are regarded as profitable government ventures. Everywhere the service is characterized by prompt transmission and prompt delivery. The percentages of loss are very small. The several national constituencies that have a parcels-post system would no more relinquish such privileges than American cities would relinquish electric lights or automobiles. One European enthusiast pronounced the establishment of the parcels-post "a service to mankind only less splendid than that of the transmission of thought."

In England it is claimed the parcels-post service would be a source of profit but for the amounts paid to the railroads for transportation, the share of 55 per cent of the receipts being regarded as exorbitant. Generally the parcels post is so joined with the rest of the mail service that its entire cost can not be counted.

The international business has grown to enormous proportions. The figures collected at Berne for 1904, in connection with the Postal Union, show that the parcels mailed across the frontiers of 36 nations and colonies that year numbered something like 38,000,000. The small percentage of that total, where the value was declared, showed an aggregate of about $162,000,000 worth of property. In that list the United States would have stood about eleventh on the showing for the fiscal year of 1906, when 264,438 parcels of an average weight of 2⅞ pounds were sent from this country abroad. Tunis sent more, according to the figures, than the United States. Germany, leading all other nations both in the dispatch and receipt of parcels in international mails, sent a total of 11,675,385, of which 11,343,516 were classed as "ordinary" and 331,869 were "with a declared value" of $23,352,378. Austria, enjoying close postal relations with Germany, dispatched 10,659,300 parcels to other countries, of which 1,082,430 had a declared value of $68,396,578.

HAS BECOME GREAT FACTOR.

The totals of "receipts" and "dispatches" of course balance for the thirty-six countries in question, but are not the same for each country represented. The rank in parcels dispatched runs: Germany, Austria, France, Hungary, Great Britain, Switzerland, Italy, Belgium, Netherlands, Tunis, British India, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Russia, Denmark, Luxemburg, Japan, and Egypt. In parcels received the order is: Germany, Hungary, Austria, Switzerland, France, Italy, Great Britain, Belgium, Russia, Netherlands, Denmark, Roumania, Spain, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Sweden, Norway, Luxemburg, Tunis, and so on. Switzerland, in 1904, received across her borders 2,788,406 parcels by post, of which 2,635,090 were "ordinary" and 133,316 were declared of a value of $9,863,886. Of 6,352,360 parcels that came over the Austrian frontier, 778,380 had a declared value of $64,788,927. Germany received 7,337,404 parcels in international mails, of which 482,472 had a declared value of $35,901,435. The parcels received by post in the United States during the fiscal year 1906 from abroad were recorded as 131,064, of an average weight of 2.73 pounds. Probably the actual number was much larger, perhaps twice as large.

Sufficient figures have been given to indicate what a great factor the parcels post has become in the trade of the world. The value of the merchandise thus transported can only be roughly estimated, but it will probably exceed half a billion dollars annually.

This business is transacted across frontiers, causing little or no friction with customs officers. Boxes with declared value are subject to the legislation of the country of origin or destination as regards payment of stamp duties on articles exported and as regards the control of stamp and customs duties on articles imported. The stamp duties and charges for examination by customs officers involved in the importation are collected from the addresses when the articles are delivered.

PROVISION FOR INSURANCE.

Practically the same rules apply for all parcels post. There is provision for insurance and also for "trade charges," which latter term means that goods can be sent C. O. D., the maximum value being 1,000 francs. The limit of weight is 5 kilograms, or 11 pounds. The cost of conveyance comprises a charge of — cents for each country participating in the territorial transit, a graduated distance tax for sea conveyance, and extra rates for cumbersome parcels, and may be increased under certain conditions by delivery fees, and, in case of declared values, by insurance fees. Weights under 2 pounds, however, are transported for a maximum of 1 franc. Special forms are provided for registering, for customs declaration, for certificate of prepayment, when that is desired, and for trade charges.

The United States is not a party to this comprehensive parcels-post convention, by which a vast quantity of merchandise is carried to different parts of the world annually, but Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Guatemala, Uruguay, and Venezuela are among the signatories. But the United States has parcels-post conventions with thirty-three different countries on somewhat different but fairly liberal terms. It keeps the postage for parcels it sends to other countries and they in turn retain the postage on parcels sent here. That saves in bookkeeping and has been found economical, whereas the more comprehensive convention, under which most of the European and Asiatic countries operate, divides the postage receipts pro rata. The United States will not transmit through its mails parcels en route from one foreign country to another. Among the latest parcels-post conventions the President has ratified under statute authority are those with Sweden, Peru, Denmark, Ecuador, and Bermuda.

CUSTOMS EASILY COLLECTED.

The popularity in this country of the parcels post is well demonstrated by the great growth in the use of international facilities. The dispatches from this country for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, amounted to 560,228 pounds, and for the year ending June 30, 1906, was 721,164 pounds, an increase of 28.73 per cent. Only one-fifth of the dispatches of the last mentioned fiscal year went to Europe, which indicates that a good share of the parcels business was with Mexico and Central South America. Parcels for Germany, Hongkong, Japan, Norway, Belgium, Great Britain, Sweden, and Denmark are accepted only for a maximum weight of 4 pounds and 6 ounces, where the maximum weight for the other countries with which the Post-Office Department now has conventions is 11 pounds.

The customs officials say that the parcels-post business with foreign countries is increasing by leaps and bounds. Within recent months better facilities for the collection of customs dues have been inaugurated, with the result, it is said, that many packages which hitherto passed without being noted are now being examined and recorded. These are offices of exchange, so called, in several of the larger post-offices of the United States where customs officials are stationed to attend to the collection of duties on these parcels from abroad. In the Washington City post-offices this foreign parcels-post business is said to have increased 300 per cent within the last twelve months. The Treasury Department keeps about twenty-five customs employees now on duty at the New York City post-office to attend to the foreign parcels-post business which goes through that office. Dutiable packages to minor offices are handled from exchange offices. Such mail addressed to Plymouth, Mass., for instance, would be held till the addressee had forwarded to the postmaster at Boston the amount of duty required.

INSPECTORS ON WATCH.

The customs officials find no serious difficulties in the enforcement of the laws with reference to the foreign parcels post. There was at first some abuse of the privileges which the parcels conventions offered, but the obstacles that the customs inspectors encounter are minor ones, and the Treasury Department expects they will be eliminated. Many of them have already disappeared under the new regulations for "mail importations" which were issued last March.

The inspectors are on the watch for parcels that happen to be sent from countries with which the United States has arrangements solely under the universal postal convention. Commercial papers not exceeding 4 pounds and 6 ounces in weight, and samples of merchandise not exceeding 12 ounces, may be brought here under that convention, but parcels are tabooed, and subject the sender to a fine. Parcels from countries having parcels-post conventions with the United States are inspected for dutiable articles, but fines are not imposed except for articles such as cigars and cigarettes that are put up in illegal quantities. A declaration of the dutiable articles is required with each parcel.

Anything as bulky as a box containing a new spring hat can be sent to most of the American countries or colonies, ranging from Newfoundland to the Danish West Indies and Chile, under existing parcels-post conventions. With a few exceptions, parcels can be sent to those American countries of a maximum length of 3 feet and 6 inches and of a maximum length and girth combined of 6 feet. The rate is 12 cents a pound or fraction thereof. Registry costs 8 cents in addition thereto.

TO MAKE PEOPLE REALIZE.

The customs officials likewise inspect another class of mail importations—those which come under existing postal conventions with Canada, Mexico, Cuba, and the Republic of Panama. No declaration of contents and value is required from those countries and everything is admitted that is allowed under the postal laws of the country where the mail originated.

The legislation that Postmaster-General Meyer has in mind comes home to practically every household in the United States. There is hardly a family in all the land that would not find it a decided convenience at times. If Mr. Meyer succeeds in making the people realize this and the arguments for the improvement of the service become generally understood, no opposition can prevail against it. Congress will be quick to see the virtues of a better parcels post, and the new law will be enacted with a whoop.

EXHIBIT 7.

[From "Government" for December, 1907.]

OMAHA, NEBR., October 25, 1907.

GEORGE VON L. MEYER,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your communication of October 18 received, for which I thank you. I am sending you herewith some editorial comments, collected from a number of trade papers. These may be of interest to you. The Trade Exhibit, I am pleased to state, is the first trade paper in the United States to approve your position as to a parcel post. During the past four years I believe I have circulated more anti-parcel-post literature than any other individual in the United States. All my work has been directed against the establishment of any parcels-post system that would be unfair to the retail merchants and which might be considered a subsidy to the mail-order system of business, and by making a rate much lower than cost of transportation to the Government would tend to concentrate business in districts where the price of labor is the lowest.

I inclose you a little pamphlet which I prepared two years ago. It is only one of the many like articles that I prepared for circulation, and which formed the basis of the antiparcel-post articles appearing in numerous trade journals. I also delivered many addresses before commercial bodies and merchants' organizations in Nebraska, Colorado, Kansas, and other Western States. I would still continue to oppose a widening of our parcel-post system did I believe that it would be injurious to those sections of our country which are now undergoing development.

After a most careful study of the plan you propose, I can not discover a single objection that can be based upon sound economics. Rather, a parcel-post extension, as you propose, will be helpful to enterprising retailers, and will assist in the building up of home industries in the so-called agricultural towns. Should any effort be made, when your proposition be laid before Congress, to have a lower rate instituted than that which you propose, I will use what little influence I have in opposing such a move.

Assuring you what little support I can give to the plan that you propose will be given, I beg to remain,

Yours, respectfully,

OMAHA TRADE EXHIBIT,
Per D. M. CARR, Editor.

GRADING AND INSPECTION OF WHEAT.

Mr. NELSON. I present a brief document prepared by R. J. Hall, president of the Minnesota Farmers' Federation, relative to the grading and inspection of wheat. I move that it be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NEWLANDS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16746) to authorize T. H. Friel or assigns to construct a dam across Mulberry Fork of the Black Warrior River, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PENROSE, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1518) to amend section 3893 of the Revised Statutes, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

RIVER IMPROVEMENTS IN DELAWARE.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution, submitted by Mr. du PONT on the 3d instant, reported it without amendment:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made, and to submit a plan and estimate for dredging and otherwise improving the navigation of each of the following-named waters:

The upper waters of the Pocomoke River from the town of Snow Hill, Md., up to or near the town of Gumboro, Del.;

The Nanticoke River from the town of Seaford to the town of Middleford, in Sussex County, Del;

The Christiana River from the city of Wilmington to the town of Christiana, in Newcastle County, Del.;

The Laurel River in Sussex County, Del., from the town of Laurel to its mouth.

That the expense of such surveys and investigations be paid out of the fund appropriated for such examinations and surveys.

DONATION OF CERTAIN CANNON.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably the joint resolution (S. R. 28) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to donate certain cannon, with their accessories, to the State of New Hampshire, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. From the same committee I report back the joint resolution (S. R. 8) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to loan certain cannon, with their accessories, to the State of New Hampshire, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. FULTON. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 15372) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker acts, and I submit a report thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to say in connection with the report that this is a bill commonly designated as the "omnibus claims bill," and in reporting back, as there are various amendments, the committee found it more convenient to recommend that all the items in the House bill be stricken out and to amend the bill by putting most of those items back in connection with other items recommended by the committee. These items are grouped by States, hence to do otherwise than as recommended by the committee would require a multitude of amendments. I ask that the report when printed shall be printed as indicated. The items which were contained in the original bill and which have been retained by the amendment have been marked to be printed in roman, and those items which are proposed by the Senate Committee on Claims are marked to be printed in italics; so that not only in the original bill when reprinted, but also in the printed report the House items will appear in roman and the amendments proposed by the committee in italics.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be printed as indicated.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. ALDRICH on the 4th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, at the rate of $1,440 per annum until otherwise provided for.

RIVER IMPROVEMENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution submitted by himself on the 3d instant, reported it without amendment:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause surveys and examinations to be made of Neuse River from Pamlico Sound to Kinston, N. C.; of Trent River from its junction with Neuse River to Trenton, N. C.; of Tar River from Pamlico Sound to Washington, N. C.; of Pasquotank River from Albemarle Sound to Elizabeth City, N. C.; of Roanoke River from Albemarle Sound to Weldon, N. C.; of Chowan River from Albemarle Sound to a point opposite Winton, N. C., with a view to improving the navigability of all said rivers and providing channels of 10 feet depth, so as to conform the depth of said rivers from their mouths in said sounds to the points specified with the depth of the canal authorized by the river and harbor act of 1906, to connect the waters of Pamlico Sound and its connecting sounds with the Atlantic Ocean at Beaufort, N. C.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. du PONT introdced a bill (S. 5939) for the relief of the heirs of Lewis D. Brown, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CURTIS introduced a bill (S. 5940) to establish a subtreasury at Kansas City, Kans., which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MARTIN. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. DANIEL], who is detained from his seat on a very sad official mission, I introduce a number of bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bills will be read by title.

Mr. MARTIN (for Mr. DANIEL) introduced a bill (S. 5941) for the relief of the heirs of John Millbourn, deceased, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (for Mr. DANIEL) introduced a bill (S. 5942) for the relief of the legal representatives of the estate of Henry H. Sibley, deceased, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 5962) to provide for the erection of a public building at Brigham City, Utah; and

A bill (S. 5963) to provide for the erection of a public building at Park City, Utah.

He also introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5964) granting an increase of pension to William D. Gaby; and

A bill (S. 5965) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Redman.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 5966) to establish a fish-hatching and fish-culture station for the hatching and propagation of shad upon or near the seacoast in the State of Georgia, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 5967) for the relief of officers of the Philippine Volunteers, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5968) granting an increase of pension to Harriet V. Gridley, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHYTE introduced a bill (S. 5969) to provide for the sale of lot 4, square 1113, in the city of Washington, D. C. which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAPP introduced a bill (S. 5970) granting an increase of pension to James Karr, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 5971) granting a pension to Ida R. Foss, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARNER introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5972) granting an increase of pension to Thomas C. Lyon;

A bill (S. 5973) granting an increase of pension to Frederick W. Odell (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5974) granting an increase of pension to George T. Smith (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5975) granting an increase of pension to James A. Whitworth.

Mr. BORAH introduced a bill (S. 5976) to amend the military record of William J. Sailor, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 5977) granting a pension to Mary Eddy Driggs, which was read twice by its title and, with an accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURKETT introduced a bill (S. 5978) granting an increase of pension to Charles E. Barker, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PENROSE introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5979) granting an increase of pension to Margaret E. McPherran;

A bill (S. 5980) granting an increase of pension to Joseph C. Lambert (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5981) granting an increase of pension to Elijah Johnson (with accompanying papers).

Mr. MARTIN (for Mr. DANIEL) introduced a bill (S. 5982) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," and acts supplementary thereto, approved June 30, 1906, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment proposing to abolish the use of irons, single or double, as a form of punishment in the Navy of the United States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the surveyor-general of Idaho from $2,000 to $3,000, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment proposing to raise the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game to a standing committee of the Senate, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to allow railway mail clerks thirty days' leave of absence, with pay, each year, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the postoffice appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,000,000 for the actual and necessary expenses, division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, while actually traveling on business of the Postoffice Department, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing that after June 30, 1908, employees of first and second class post-offices and in other post-offices having city delivery service be granted leave of absence, with full pay, not exceeding thirty days in a fiscal year, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BAILEY (by request) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT TO FINANCIAL BILL.

Mr. BURKETT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

GRADING AND INSPECTION OF GRAIN.

On motion of Mr. MCCUMBER it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate document room 500 copies of Senate Document No. 116, relative to the grading and inspection of grain.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

REPORT ON ROAD BUILDING IN YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. CARTER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to forward to the Senate a report prepared by the engineer in charge of road building and improvements in the Yellowstone National Park on a survey made for a new road from the West Gallatin River to connect with the main traveled roadway in said park, at or near Golden Gate or Mammoth Hot Springs.

PARCELS POST AND POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer a resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of certain bills pending before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read and considered by unanimous consent, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads 15,000 copies each of Senate bills 5115 and 5122 and 3,000 copies each of Senate bills 1234, 4853, and 5508.

Mr. CULBERSON. May I ask what committee the resolution comes from?

Mr. PENROSE. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. For the information of the Senator, I will state that these bills relate to the parcels post and postal savings banks. There is very great demand from all over the country for copies of those measures. The total cost will be less than $500, and under the rule the resolution can now be considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the request of the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice-President appointed Mr. CLAPP, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. OWEN, the conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

H. R. 15444. An act extending the time for the construction of a dam across Rainy River;

H. R. 16073. An act to authorize the town of Edgecomb, Lincoln County, Me., to maintain a free bridge across tide waters; and

H. R. 16749. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania by the Liberty Bridge Company," approved March 2, 1907.

H. R. 15841. An act to amend section 4896 of the Revised Statutes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Patents.

H. R. 16874. An act to amend section 13 of an act entitled "An act to divide the State of Texas into four judicial districts," approved March 11, 1902, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H. J. Res. 101. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to secure a suitable design for a statue of the late Commodore John D. Sloat at Monterey, Cal., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DIXON submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate conferees on H. R. 15219, "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department," etc., are hereby instructed to insert on page 37, line 15, after the word "dollars," the following: "the same to be immediately available."

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I wish to give notice that immediately after the close of the morning business on Wednesday next I will address the Senate on what is known as the "Aldrich bill," if it shall not at that time be engaged in more important business.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT LAGRANGE, GA.

Mr. CLAY. The bill (S. 2736) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Lagrange, Ga., and the bill (S. 2732) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Cordele, Ga., were, when reached on the Calendar, passed over at my instance. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2736. Neither bill will lead to debate.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $50,000 to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, elevators, and heating and ventilating apparatus, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office in the city of Lagrange, Ga.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to add the following:

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building in the city of Lagrange, Ga."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CORDELE, GA.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senate to consider the other bill to which I referred, which was also passed over at my instance when reached on the Calendar.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2732) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Cordele, Ga., was read and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $50,000 to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, elevators, and heating and ventilating apparatus, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office in the city of Cordele, Ga.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill the following:

The building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building in the city of Cordele, Ga."

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who is absent on a sad errand, called my attention to the fact that the bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, relating to ocean mail service, was by unanimous consent to be considered yesterday morning. Of course it could not receive consideration yesterday morning, and he requested me to ask that it might be brought before the Senate this morning; but the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] has given notice that at this time he would desire to occupy the floor with his speech on the currency question.

I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday morning this bill may be taken up immediately after the routine business for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore made with regard to the bill mentioned be modified, and that the bill be taken up for consideration immediately after the close of the routine morning business on Tuesday, March 10. Is there objection?

Mr. TELLER. Will that interfere with the financial bill? I do not want to have that interfered with.

Mr. FRYE. It is to be taken up only immediately after the routine business. Of course, at 2 o'clock the currency bill will be the unfinished business.

Mr. TELLER. I believe we have had notice given of a speech to be made on Tuesday.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At 2 o'clock is the notice.

Mr. FRYE. At 2 o'clock on that day.

Mr. TELLER. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. DEPEW rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, Presidents, Secretaries of the Treasury, and Comptrollers of the Currency have for many years seen the defects in our banking system and urged legislation. Eminent bankers, both at home and abroad, have taken the same view. For various reasons Congress has failed to act or even to seriously consider any of these suggestions. The legislative body is always conservative, at least in the sense that it never acts until there is a strong public pressure behind. Legislation may at times seem radical, but it is always because the representatives believe such measures properly interpret and put in force the popular will.

We have had several disastrous panics, the most noted being those of 1837, 1857, 1873, 1893 and 1907.

All but the last became subjects of rancorous party discussion, and there was no agreement at the times of their occurrence as to the causes of their happening. But now contemporary opinion with great unanimity puts the blame upon our system of banking and currency and demands action and remedial legislation.

Under the delicate system of credit upon which the commercial transactions of the world are now based there will always be panics. They may come from wars or from fabulous destruction of property by earthquakes or fire or from overspeculating, resulting in the bankruptcy of financial institutions, succeeded by loss of confidence. These panics occur in every one of the great industrial countries. They happen in England, Germany, Austria, Italy and France, but less frequently in France because the French are the most conservative and the least speculative of all peoples. They are a thrifty nation of savers and investors, and not of exploiters and promoters. They lose capital, as they did in the Panama Canal, to the extent of hundreds of millions, but it is taken out of their stockings and not out of their business. While these financial and industrial disasters are common to manufacturing, producing and trading nations, they never imperil the whole structure of trade and finance in other countries as they do with us. They never lead to such stringency of money and phenomenal rates of interest. The rate of interest marks the price which business pays for capital. As it advances new enterprises stop, production is curtailed and industries shut down, until finally, if money must be had at prices which necessitate great and continuing losses, the whole community is involved, capital and labor are both temporarily out of employment, with bankruptcy for the one and starvation or reliance upon charity for the other.

The United States is the greatest creator of wealth of all countries, and its productiveness is almost as great as that of all other nations who might be deemed its rivals combined. A financial panic with us leaves the field strewn with the dead and wounded, but our enormous possibilities for the creation of wealth speedily bring back prosperous times. The new and eager recruits and contestants for fortune fail to remember those who have fallen in the battle and take little heed of the lessons of the catastrophe. With our people so keen upon business propositions, with our agricultural and mineral production throwing the balance of trade in our favor every year, with our gold reserve kept at a higher average than that of any other nation, because it flows in to us to pay the international balances which are due, these recurring disasters, so universal and so terrible, must be caused by deficiency somewhere in our system. We have a larger per capita currency than any other country in Europe except France, and yet money, mere currency, has been for months commanding a premium, and in one of our panics gold was raised to 250 per cent. The German, French and English financiers say such conditions are impossible with them. They are unanimous in the opinion that their safety and our peril are because they possess central banks with power to issue emergency currency, while our currency is rigid and inelastic, and there is and can be no unity of action among our 6,600 independent banks.

There have been efforts made in this discussion to locate and place the blame for this panic. It furnishes a fine field for partisan attack, but a calm and judicial review of the situation will develop many and sufficient reasons which are neither political, personal nor partisan. Undoubtedly the large and continuing increase year by year in the production of gold, which is the universal standard of value, deranges calculations and exchanges. The figures of this increase for the last decade are startling. The world's production of gold was $7,000,000 in 1700, $12,000,000 in 1800, $262,000,000 in 1900 and $425,000,000 in 1907.

This shows that while in the hundred years from 1700 to 1800 the increase was only five millions, in the hundred years from 1800 to 1900 it was two hundred and fifty millions and in the short period of seven years from 1900 to 1907 it was one hundred and sixty-three millions.

While according to Lord Cromer $150,000,000 are buried in the ground by the Egyptians, who are universally money hoarders, and a large sum used in the arts, the amount available for currency is constantly and rapidly increasing. The Russo-Japanese war and the San Francisco earthquake and fire burned up and destroyed a very appreciable percentage of the capital of the world. Industrial expansion, the consolidation of industries into strong and unified corporations with increasing productive power and requiring more money, great enterprises by governments and by corporations, the requirements of the railways caused by the increase in traffic, and amounting within the last year to a thousand millions of dollars, have locked up immense amounts of capital otherwise fluid into permanent investments. The railroad companies tried to raise in round figures $1,600,000,000, but could sell only a small portion of their 4 per cent bonds, and including what they obtained by the issue of short-term notes carrying 6, 7, and 7½ per cent interest, were able to borrow only $960,000,000, or about two-thirds of their immediate practical needs. The industrials were having such prosperity that they needed about $600,000,000, and nearly two-thirds of the sum were secured by the stronger concerns at exorbitant interest, but those which failed to get the money for their capital requirements were forced into the hands of receivers. The tremendous volume of our internal commerce, the feverish activity of our manufacturers and the active demand and high prices for the food products of the West and Northwest, and for the cotton of the South, and for our coal, iron, copper, gold and silver, expanded our credit until probably at the time our trouble began 98 per cent of our business was being done by credit agencies and not more than 2 per cent with currency.

When the annual demand came for $300,000,000 of reserve money to be taken from the banks in the central reserve cities to the West and South to move the crops, it called for a curtailment of over $1,200,000,000 in credits and the calling of loans to meet this demand. If we had a central bank or if there was by some Government agency concerted action among our 6,600 national banks our affairs would never have reached this perilous condition. In Germany, for instance, the commercial paper of all banks in the Empire would have been indorsed by the banks which had discounted it and, being rediscounted in the central bank, have been the basis for currency to meet the demand and tide over the crisis without endangering the whole manufacturing and commercial fabric. But we have a currency which we can not expand, except by processes too slow to do any good, and which can not contract when the demand for currency relaxes. We have to maintain a national debt to have any currency, and we have to retain our present system to furnish a market for Government bonds in national emergencies at a rate which makes them from 15 to 25 per cent higher on the same interest charge than those of any other country.

There is no doubt that hasty and ill-considered legislation in many States had much to do with the panic. One-seventh of the wealth of the United States is invested in railroads. A very large amount of the securities upon which business is done is based upon these securities. There are many thousands of railroad freight rates in force at the same time, and they are frequently changed according to the necessities of competition or of the traffic. Whether a reduction of rates will be confiscatory or not can only be ascertained by an investigation and the testimony of experts. This is thoroughly understood by the investing public, both in this country and in Europe. Rate-reduction bills were passed in many legislatures without reference to committees, without discussion, and with a whoop-la cry of "Hit them again; they have no friends." The machinery of the Mauretania or Lusitania is as complex as a watch. Any man could throw a crowbar into it and produce derangements which might jeopardize the safety of the ship, or do damage which would require experts and time and money to repair. Governor Hughes stated the true principle of the treatment of rates when, having advised and secured from the legislature the creation of public utilities commissions with full power, he courageously vetoed a 2-cent fare bill, which had been unanimously passed, on the ground that until those commissions had investigated and reported neither the Governor nor the legislature had any information upon which to base intelligent action affecting the securities owned by millions of investors and the employment and wages of millions of men.

Much has been said here and everywhere against Wall street, and sometimes New York is made interchangeable with Wall street. One of the most eminent agricultural experts in the country said to me recently:

If you New Yorkers would stop buying diamonds and autmobiles the farmers with their seven thousand millions of salable products this year will save the country.

New York is the financial center of the United States, and, if our banking system was scientific, would be of the world. It is the greatest manufacturing city in the world. It has four millions of inhabitants within its boundaries, and if those who reside in the suburban districts and have their daily business in New York are included, as they ought to be, six millions of people belong to the metropolis, or more than the population of fourteen of the sovereign States of the United States. Every section of the country—North, South, East and West—has as many representatives there as can be found in their largest cities. Every country bank is in a sense a branch of New York institutions. If a railroad is to be constructed or extended or its facilities enlarged, a mine opened, a water power developed, a burned town rebuilt or a disaster like that of the Johnstown flood alleviated by the raising of millions of dollars, the applicants all come to New York, and if the money can not be raised there it can be had nowhere. The various interchanges of the metropolis are the thermometers of values and of advancing or receding prosperity. Not over 1 per cent of the people who operate in these exchanges are New Yorkers. Every city in the United States has branches representing the houses which buy and sell on the stock, cotton, produce, coal and metal exchanges of New York. Every bank in the United States sends its surplus funds, when there is no opportunity for local investment, to New York to get the interest prevailing there upon all loans, and also because their exchange on New York is available all over the world.

Prosperity and high prices have paid off farm mortgages, and western farmers are depositors instead of borrowers. Thousands of rural banks find there is no neighborhood demand for this money, so they send it to New York, where it produces a redundancy which stimulates speculation and overtrading. When an emergency arises in the West, the Northwest or the South necessitating the return of this money to those sections, they call for it immediately and expect it in lawful money. This always leads to the sudden calling of loans, and interest goes up by leaps and bounds. If confidence is a bit disturbed, then others withdraw their money. No bank in the world is strong enough or possesses the liquid assets to respond in a day to a call for all or a large part of its deposits. Then comes a panic which involves the whole country, and the country banks and other sufferers are, in the main, responsible for the stringency of which they complain. There is, unhappily, always speculation, and at times dangerous speculation, in the New York exchanges, but so there is in the exchanges of London, Paris, Berlin, Frankfort and Vienna. The movement of trade would stop and all interchanges and sales of products cease if there was not a central market where people with goods could always find a purchaser. It is, in a sense, the ocean of credit which supports the vessels of commerce, great and small. Tidal waves can not be abolished without drying up the ocean and need not be feared by craft built and manned to ride them safely in all weathers. The banks and bankers of New York bought abroad $100,000,000 in gold, and most of this was shipped to the West, and reserves were drawn down to the danger line for the same purpose. The panic was as unreasoning as it was unreasonable. It demonstrated that there is no financial cleavage of classes in such a stampede. Men and women who came in automobiles and carriages were equally as clamorous as those who had their little all in the suspected trust companies or banks.

Many years ago a man came into my office and introduced himself, saying that he had made a million of dollars in western mines, had brought it in cash to New York, but possessed experience and intelligence far beyond the tenderfeet of Wall street, many of whom he had met, and wanted an introduction to New York bankers and brokers. I stated to him the dangers, told him that I had seen financial cataclysms which destroyed the best calculations of the most level-headed speculators, with the largest fortunes, but I might as well have attempted to stop a stampede of a herd of buffalo. I said, "Well, I give you six months." He lasted nearly a year, and then I gave him transportation to Denver, to begin life anew in the mountains of Colorado. In a few years he returned with another million, dug out of the earth, saying that he intended to get back from Wall street what he had lost. In three months I again enabled him to reach the mining regions of the Rockies, but have never heard from him since. His two millions did not go into the bank accounts of New Yorkers only. It was found in the balance sheets of traders who were on the opposite side of the market in Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, Buffalo, San Francisco and New Orleans, Charleston, Atlanta, Galveston and Boston, Portland, Me., Portland, Oreg. and Seattle.

Commodore Vanderbilt once said to me that any fool could make a million, but it took a wise man to keep it. It is these fools who are responsible for the exaggerated fortunes of which we hear so much, and it was the wise use of these fortunes in the recent panic by the wise men who had accumulated and kept them which saved from annihilation fools and wise men alike whose all was embarked in their business.

The discussion of this question has taken a wide range, and has been able and exhaustive. A stranger reading these arguments would come to the conclusion that there is neither speculation nor gambling anywhere in the United States except in the New York Stock Exchange, and that the New York banks both promote and help speculation, and thereby involve bankers and banking institutions, national and State, all over the country who are entirely innocent of such practices. Not only the United States, but Canada, Mexico, the South American Republics and the West Indies on this side of the ocean, and Europe on the other, transact their purchases and sales of securities on the New York Stock Exchange which are listed there. Pure and simple speculative transactions are only the fringe upon its serious business. I believe in the virtue of the country without conceding the wickedness of the metropolis. There is not much difference in the human nature of the pavement and of the field. The banking mind works in like channels all over the world.

The western and northwestern farmers agree to withhold their grain for higher prices. They are indebted for the expenses of the harvesting and of carrying it to the granaries at the stations and keeping it there to the local banks who finance them, and this is in the nature of a speculation. The same is true of the cotton growers of the South, and they claim that by this process, aided by their banking institutions, they have added enormously to the value of their crop. Real estate booms in prospective city and town lots are financed by banks all over the country and they are purely speculative. The same human nature leads people to buy stocks or grain or cotton on the New York exchanges. To carry this to the gold fields of Nevada, the men in the shanties of these tented towns of the mining districts are as eager watchers of the blackboards which record the prices of their mining stocks as are those in the brokers' offices of the cities. In some counties of Kentucky the price of tobacco is now regulated by the shotgun. Night riders burn the barns and lash the backs of those who are on the other side of the market. The method is original and spectacular, but wholly speculative.

In my days of active railroading I made an extended tour every year covering the Middle and Western States. Upon one of these trips my train was stopped by an obstruction on the track which was being repaired, and I saw among the laborers a man evidently capable of better work. I told him so, and asked him how he came to be simply a laborer on the track. He said:

Do you see that farm yonder with that good house and outbuildings? That was recently mine. I was happy and comfortable. A man came along and offered me $10,000. It was more than I thought the farm worth and I accepted it. He paid me $1,000 down and gave me a mortgage for nine thousand. I then moved to town and sat in the office day by day, where the maps were displayed of the avenues, streets, parks and university grounds of the town which was to cover miles about. I saw my farm bought and sold until it brought $15,000. I got the fever and became convinced that every foot of it was part of a city lot. I bought it back for twenty thousand, gave the thousand dollars which I had received and a mortgage for nineteen thousand and then the boom burst. The farm was sold under the mortgage and brought $5,000 and left me in debt under a deficiency judgment for three times what I was worth when I parted with it. That is why I am working on the track.

I remember in another State where the mayor and the city officials took me about in carriages, showing me what was and what was to be. There was the real estate exchange, the blackboard, the excited bidders, the transfer of lots and all the paraphernalia of the stock exchange. At every corner I was shown a house in which lived a man who had been a railroad conductor, or a locomotive engineer, or a small farmer, or grain dealer, or lawyer, or clerk, who was now worth hundreds of thousands on paper. That was stimulating everybody to put what little money he had upon margins for the purchase of lots. I finally said to the mayor, "I see you have everything mercantile, industrial, financial, charitable, religious and educational which a great city and large population may require, but I have noticed no graveyard." "Oh!" he said, "Our cemetery was what is now the center of our city as it is laid out. It was too expensive to keep for that purpose and retarded our expansion, so we moved it some miles over the hill and transplanted our dead to the new location. That corner lot, now worth $20,000, was my family plot. I was compelled to remove the remains of my wife over the hill to the new location, but I knew her spirit approved of it, because she was always most deeply interested in the growth of our town." Traveling again through another State I saw a large portion of the State staked out. I ascertained that the banks were loaning money to carry on these operations. I stated the facts to an interviewer at the next city, as I had ascertained them, with the result that the train was stopped the next day at noon and several bushels of telegrams were handed in, protesting against the interview. It created a panic of considerable proportions in New York and London. One message stated that I had cost honest people the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars, while several from the booming towns assured me that leading citizens with shotguns were on my trail. We all remember how in the early days of the oil excitement in Pennsylvania farmers on the poorest lands became rich and rich men became poor and the wildest speculation prevailed, receiving encouragement in every country banking office.

We remember the absurd and spectacular career of Coal Oil Johnnie who arose to be a millionaire in a day and spent all in a month. I want to assure Senators from the States where I have noticed these things that there is no such reckless speculation on the stock exchange in New York. There is no currency panic because of stock transactions on the stock exchange. There is not a dollar passed there in money. It is all done by checks and the balances adjusted between the banks in the clearing house. The shares and bonds are actually bought and paid for in all these vast transactions whose record presents such phenomenal figures. Investors and buyers for a rise are inextricably mixed, as the stocks and bonds are actually bought and paid for. The demand loans are not nearly all for gambling on the exchanges. There are thousands of transactions where the man with securities which are bankable, but a permanent part of his estate, borrows on demand, because he gets the money at a low rate of interest and needs it for a turn in the sale of real estate or of other property by which he may be able in a few days to pay off the loan without having an interest charge running against him for money for which he has no further use, or he uses the securities for temporary loans in his business. While it is the purpose of the creation of banks and their duty to aid business and industries through the legitimate use of commercial paper, nevertheless the enormous increase of bonds and stocks and their use as security for loans for all purposes have imposed upon the banks an enlargement of their business and an addition to their responsibilities which did not exist fifty years ago.

One of the railroads of the country, to increase its equipment and enlarge its facilities, either upon its own motion or the order of the legislature or the railroad commission, issues ten, twenty, thirty or fifty millions of new securities. The railroad has no means of disposing of them. It is not in the banking business. It goes to one of the great bankers, and he immediately forms a syndicate which buys these bonds at a price and gives the railroad the money. The bankers are not supposed, in the large transactions in which they are engaged, to have these millions in their vaults. They borrow the money upon these securities and their credit from the banks. They may be able to dispose of them in a very short time, but if there comes a panic or a period of very active money, the bonds can not be sold for some time without a loss. In either case the banks finance the transaction until the bankers can find somewhere in the world a market for these securities, but they are generally call or demand loans. Such transactions are as much an aid to commerce and industries as loans upon commercial paper and the usual and ordinary course of business in a bank of deposits and discounts. They extend the facilities of the railroad. They give employment to multitudes of men. They provide means for a larger and cheaper distribution of the products of the farm, the factory and the mine. In the round-up of the transaction the railroad has enlarged its equipment and facilities, the bank has had a profitable use for its money, the banker has made his commission on the sales and the country is richer with larger possibilities by the transaction. New York does this to an extent unknown anywhere else, but it does it for every State, Territory and section of the Union.

I fully realize the evils of gambling, whether in stocks or grain or in any other way. Its demoralization and perils are patent to everybody. I will aid in any effort to suppress it which does not involve embarrassment or ruin to legitimate business. But what I am saying is that in proportion to the volume of its business and the magnitude of its transactions there is as little of it in New York as anywhere else in the United States, and it is under better control. We can not abolish doing business on a margin of cash and the balance on credit. Every successful business man in the country has risen by the use of his credit. All merchants, manufacturers and bankers would work within very narrow limits if their transactions were confined to their cash capital.

I heard an interesting discussion in London about twenty years ago between English and American bankers of international reputation. Money was nominally 1 per cent and in little demand at that. Bankers of London were refusing to take deposits. They could not derive incomes sufficient to pay for the care of them. The opinion of these London and American financiers was that the wealth-producing powers of the world had exceeded investment possibilities. The same thought found expression in the most authoritative of the financial journals. They saw no hope for people who were compelled to live upon invested capital and who had not the ability to work. In their view 1 per cent was to be the standard of interest, and a man would have to be worth a million to leave his family fairly comfortable. These financiers and financial writers could not foresee what the world has experienced in the tremendous, almost miraculous, development of industries during the last decade.

It has created a demand for money which raised the rate of interest in the Bank of England to 7 per cent and made the prevailing profitable charge in Germany 7½. While we have the same conditions, yet our rate should never have exceeded 10 per cent, but we know it has varied from 20 to 120 during three months. These countries had the scientific machinery tested and tried by a century of experience, while we were living within the bolted and barred walls of an inelastic and unexpanding currency. Our financial system is like a pyramid placed upon its apex. The higher it is built the greater the danger of its toppling over, and yet every new strata is evidence of what we call prosperity. The systems of Germany and other countries construct the broadest foundation for the pyramid of their expanding business and credits, and as it rises the foundation becomes firmer.

The prosperity of the decade now closing, owing to good harvests, good markets and high prices for products, has paid off mortgages on farms and increased deposits in the country banks beyond all precedent and all forecasts of the past. If the farmer needs no money on mortgages, if the local demand of the country merchant is easily satisfied, if, as has been the case, money accumulates in these rural communities far beyond any local needs, we have in large sections of our country the conditions which prevailed twenty years ago when the bankers and financial writers of London were predicting hopeless stagnation of capital. But capital is fluid as never before, and so it flows from these rural neighborhoods to the places where it is loanable at a profit.

Commercial paper issued legitimately in the great cities for the necessary transaction of business appears among the assets of these country banks with names unknown to the neighborhoods. This paper is bought upon confidence in their correspondents in the cities and the relations between banker and depositor and borrower which is the life of credit can not exist. A trust company closing its doors, a bank failure or an overcapitalized industry going to pieces undermines confidence. Then with the inability of immediate response an unreasonable alarm spreads all over the country. We have just escaped the most potential possibility of financial and industrial ruin in our history. We were in this peril at a time when production was never so great; new wealth from the farms, the mines and the forests never created so rapidly; markets never so good and the balance of trade in our favor never so large. Conditions similar but not so acute happen every year when the crops are to be moved, and bank reserves in the central reserve cities are drawn down with the curtailment of $4 of credit for every dollar shipped. The oft-repeated statement of our redundant currency and of our per capita being greater by 25 per cent than that of any other country is largely a delusion. Take out of our currency the amount which the Government holds in gold, the currency which it keeps out of the banks and in the Treasury to meet current expenses, and that which is locked up in bank reserves against deposits and probably instead of three thousand millions less than one-half of that will be in circulation.

There is no other people in the world whose per capita keeps anything like so much money out of circulation by carrying it in their pockets and hiding it in their houses. The circulating medium for the ordinary and necessary transactions of life, which are done upon the cash basis in foreign countries, is largely gold, silver and copper. The result is that only a limited amount is carried by the individual. Our citizens, whether men or women, rarely have gold. They dislike silver and use bills. The aggregate of money upon the persons of men, women and grown-up children of our country is enormous. The same is true of the sums which are in nooks and corners and hidden recesses of the homes of our people. Immigrants from Europe who spend little and save nearly all their earnings, to live in ease at home the rest of their lives, send abroad annually about $250,000,000, of which it is estimated nearly one hundred millions in cash are carried by those returning. Twenty-five thousand millions of current business was confronted, when loss of confidence impaired credits, with the peril that it must have nearly the equivalent of thirteen billions of deposits in cash to go ahead, and millions of depositors wanted at once to draw out to hoard or to hold in safe-deposit boxes for pay rolls all of that less than one thousand five hundred millions of currency available.

For three days the most prosperous and progressive of peoples, at the high tide of the most wonderful prosperity of their marvelous material development, were on the brink of the most destructive and widespread financial and industrial breakdown ever experienced. The situation was saved because the banks had a leader of vast experience, of demonstrated genius for affairs, and large resources, who could unite them and whom they could follow, and because the banks of New York had the courage and wisdom to act in concert, and because the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Cortelyou, met the situation with rare firmness and ability.

We are in danger with our inelastic currency from another source which has received little attention. What has been done once can be repeated, and we have had artificial currency famines brought on by audacious operators locking up money. With the vast resources which a few speculators can now control, the temptation is great to put the prices of securities or products up or down by cornering the currency. Ours is the only country where this is possible. The Bank of France could swamp an unscrupulous syndicate attempting such a scheme with a thousand millions of dollars of currency, and other financially civilized countries would be proportionately powerful, while our banks are powerless to expand quickly in lawful money and might be enjoined by speculators in their makeshift efforts to save the situation by clearing-house certificates and credit devices. It is a tribute to the integrity, the morality, and the patriotism of our much-abused bankers and men of great wealth that they have used all their resources and all their power to prevent, to make impossible, the success of such efforts.

A Senator upon this floor the other day placed Andrew Jackson next to George Washington in the influence which eminent men have had upon the destinies of the Republic. Alexander Hamilton, the greatest original genius this country or any other ever knew, in placing our chaotic finance upon a stable basis, brought into existence, among other things, a central national bank. Andrew Jackson, who hated all banks, not only destroyed the central bank, but left a profound impression against it upon the minds of his countrymen, and so deeply embedded that hostility in his own generation that to-day his dead hand clutches with a grip which can not be loosened a central national bank. We can not, without consequences not to be contemplated, change our present basis of national banking and circulation based upon Government bonds, but we can add to the present system an elasticity which, while it will not prevent, will avert many of the dangers now threatening us; dangers which will increase as our country grows in population, wealth and productive energies.

I would prefer an asset currency for our emergencies such as has proven eminently successful under conditions exactly the same as ours in Canada, and which works with like success in Scotland.

I know that generations must pass before the traditions of General Jackson will permit a central national bank. While clearing-house certificates and other makeshifts of doubtful legality, which have been held up to attack and ridicule here, have been our only safety in these recurring financial difficulties, we ought by legislation to supply practical and simple remedies. There is as much danger in redundant as in restricted currency, and if we add to our present system an elasticity which has been demonstrated to be safe and effective under proper restrictions of taxation, we are entering upon no new experiment, but simply following the proved experience of other highly organized industrial and financial countries. A currency based upon assets which would go out automatically when the interest rate rose so as to make it profitable and come back automatically under a tax which would make it unprofitable when the interest rate went down, would give us easily and instantly all the new currency required. If it was printed in the same way as other bills, presented the same appearance, had the sanction of the law, and was issued only under the authority of Government officials, it would meet emergencies satisfactorily and the demands of the business of the country, preventing the curtailment of commercial credits for legitimate business and removing the danger of cornering of the currency. Five thousand millions of dollars were lost by investors in the shrinking of securities, and probably one hundred millions to wage-earners in the stoppage of enterprises and curtailment of employment in the recent panic.

There is a popular delusion about a rich man's panic. It means a general belief and satisfaction that the so-called "multimillionaires" have suffered serious losses. Men of great wealth and financial genius foresee the storm long before it breaks. If property is to be attacked by legislation or depreciated by a panic they sell out when the public are buyers. They foresee again when the storm has spent its force, repurchase at panic prices, and double their fortunes. It is business men whose capital is active and who are borrowers on their credit to keep their business enlarging who suffer loss or are forced into liquidation or bankruptcy.

But while I believe in an asset currency, under such safeguards and restrictions as have proved successful in the experience and practice of other commercial and industrial nations, I have become convinced of two things: First, that it is impossible at this session of Congress to revolutionize our banking and currency system; second, that it is absolutely essential that we should have at the earliest possible moment some form of emergency currency. We do not need this relief to-day, but no one can predict when it will be required because of the limited amount of available currency, amounting to less than 8 per cent of the total deposits in all the banks of the country.

Panics and bank suspensions are matters of confidence. The fact that the banks are sound, as the recent panic demonstrated to such an extraordinary degree, is of no avail. The first people to draw money from suspected institutions were the banks and trust companies which had deposited in those against which rumor leveled its shafts. All that the public grasp when fear prevails is that there is no way of furnishing money except by the help which the Government can give in deposits and by currency being issued under a process now too slow to be available and of too limited amount to remedy any difficulties. Both institutions and individuals forget, in their anxiety to get their money out of the bank, that its assets are necessarily in commercial paper, securities and real estate which can not immediately be turned into cash.

I would like to change our system of bond-secured currency. I would like to have all our various kinds of currency consolidated into one, and that based upon gold as a reserve, with power to increase it in a crisis, as can be done under similar conditions in Germany, France, England, Scotland and Canada. But the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] says in his very able and lucid speech that our system is a growth and makeshift created to meet emergencies at different periods.

That is the fact, and it has become so deeply embedded in our commercial, financial and industrial life that it can not be changed in a day. During my earlier, more tumultuous and enthusiastic years I expected the millennium to arrive as soon as needed in every department of human endeavor, but I have learned in the observations of a long life that reforms come slowly and not at once. Those succeed which are tentative and proved by trial until perfected. I think everyone will admit that we can not go into a broad scheme which will undo absolutely the work since 1862 and build within the next few months a wise and enduring structure. That can only be done in times of industrial prosperity, confidence and financial peace. That we have not now. We are living in a period of unrest, and the wounds of our catastrophe are not yet healed. The country is recuperating and, with its enormous resources and productiveness, will recover rapidly; but the basic condition of its restoration is confidence in the belief that the banks will not again suspend and that the depositors can have their money whenever they want it. This bill tides over the crisis. In forty-eight hours five hundred millions of new money can be had. The fact that this is possible is in itself assurance and reassurance.

By the reports of two of the greatest railroad systems in the country, the gross earnings of one of them had fallen off 12½ per cent and of the other 18½ per cent for January, 1908, as compared with January of last year. This meant that there had been in each of these systems a corresponding percentage in the reduction of expenses. "Reduction of expenses" is a sentence of calamity to tens of thousands of workers and fear to them all. If this reduction involves 50,000 men, it means 250,000 people who are without incomes. It means strained credit for the storekeeper and possibly bankruptcy. It means a smaller demand upon the manufacturer and from him upon the raw-material producer. The effect of this percentage of decrease in earnings on the railroads is idle cars, and, with the curtailing of the movement of traffic, a reduction in the consumption of coal, which again reacts with like effect upon the coal miner and the coal operator. The managers of these properties believe that the downward movement is checked. They see that every condition exists for a renewal of the prosperity which was so suddenly halted in October of last year, but they all believe that the public must be assured that legislation has provided means to increase the currency to meet emergent and exigent demands, and with confidence that this has been done the tremendous forces of production will again energize industries and transportation.

The Aldrich bill, so called, is simple in its remedies, practical and easily understood. It is a makeshift, if you please, but as long as we can not recreate our system at once, expedients which are effective are essential to meet present conditions. The main thing is to have securities available for the additional currency which are so large in amount and so easy to be held or obtained that the control or cornering of them is impossible. The bill under consideration accomplishes this result.

This legislation should be supplemented by a commission. I do not mean a commission of experts, so called, but a commission composed of the joint committees of the two Houses of Congress. I have little faith in commissions selected outside of Congress to recommend work for the National Legislature. Such commissions are necessarily composed of specialists who are limited in knowledge to the line of their own studies and activities and know little of other interests and have less confidence in their advocates, while legislators of long experience, who are committed to no theory, who are practical and who have heard all sides over and over again, can formulate into legislation the results gathered from expert testimony bearing upon questions in which they also have had broad and large experience.

I think we should strengthen the position of the Comptroller of the Currency. So long as the Government is in the banking business, his functions are as important as that of any officer in the Government. The position requires a man of first-class ability, training and experience. When he demonstrates this upon the national platform, his services are required for life positions at large salaries by the great financial institutions of the country. These institutions, whether they be railroads or banks or trust companies, understand that the salary, no matter how large, which secures the right man—and there are very few compared with the demand—is of little account. I have known in my own experience several instances where the talent of the manager of a corporation dealing in enormous figures was the difference between surplus and dividends and deficiencies and bankruptcy. The Comptroller of the Currency should have Cabinet pay and a term of office not dependent upon changes of Administration. The Government, having secured the best available talent, should be able to retain it by the permanency and dignity of the office, even though its salary was far below what a private corporation would gladly give.

The number of bank examiners should be increased very largely and their compensation be a fixed salary instead of fees. I believe there are now eighty, and it is impossible for that number, however competent or well intentioned, to make the frequent examinations necessary to keep their fingers upon the 6,600 national banks. I think the commission I have suggested should provide some method by which the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency and the Treasurer of the United States could be brought in intimate contact with a board selected by the national banks and possessing supervisory and advisory powers, with some executive responsibilities, which might concentrate the banking power of the country for the prevention of panics and also for the protection of depositors, stockholders and the public against badly or corruptly managed institutions. This would meet in a limited way the duties of a central bank without its power. I agree with the Senator from Alabama that there should be a larger amount of the reserve kept in the country banks and that they should have the privilege of keeping part of them in bonds which could be used for emergency currency. I believe it would be a hazardous experiment for the Government to guarantee deposits. The effect upon State banks, trust companies and savings banks would be disastrous. They could not survive the competition of national banks with the Government standing sponsor for their deposits. It would eliminate the sense of responsibility now resting upon officers and directors. It would place a premium upon incompetency and carelessness. It would penalize banks wisely, honestly and efficiently managed by taxing them to raise a fund to pay the debts of those which fail through bad or dishonest officials.

The difficulties of this legislation are in the possession of every Senator. Our mails are crowded with suggestions, all different. I wrote a letter, mailing with it a copy of this bill, to the officers of over 400 banks. Most of them have responded, but there is no substantial agreement among them. The Bankers' Association of the United States prepared a bill, which I think excellent, but that has been attacked by bankers of distinction, and its passage at this session rendered impossible. Action at the earliest moment possible is the demand of the people. Industry is waiting, as never before, upon the removal of a present danger which excites general apprehension. Failure to agree upon any legislation would result in suspense and partial paralysis. The country is prosperous, and its financial, transportation, farming and manufacturing resources are unimpaired. Their movement halts because of fear that our currency, notoriously insufficient in times of trouble, will not have given to it by this Congress an elasticity which will prevent a recurrence of crises like that through which we have recently passed. The Aldrich bill is the result of the most careful study of one of the ablest of committees on finance. It is the only one upon which there is any promising unison of opinion. Therefore it is that I believe this measure, amended along the lines of its original plan and design by the suggestions which the debate has evolved, will accomplish the purpose of restoring confidence, preventing and minimizing panics and meeting emergencies until a full and complete system for our banking and currency can be perfected.

PAY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to call up the bill (S. 4030) to fix the pay of the Army, which was under consideration when we adjourned Wednesday.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that the Senator from Wyoming, in charge of the bill, will accept the amendment proposed a few days ago by me to section 2.

Mr. WARREN. I now accept, so far as the committee is concerned, the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 2 and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. That the average pay of enlisted men of the Army as now established is hereby increased 40 per cent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. On behalf of the committee, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 1 it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That nothing in this section is intended to increase or change, or shall be construed as increasing or changing the present pay or allowances of any officer in the United States Navy, and the effect of this section shall only be upon the officers of the Army herein enumerated, and section 13 of an act entitled "An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States," approved March 3, 1889, shall not be construed as changing the pay of any naval officer by reason of the provisions of this act, which shall apply solely to the pay of officers of the Army.

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not catch distinctly from the reading the meaning of the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Texas that under existing law the bill, if we passed it as the committee reported it, would affect the pay of the active officers of the Navy.

Mr. CULBERSON. Does the Senator mean section 2?

Mr. WARREN. Not section 2. This does not apply to section 2, but to section 1. It comes in at the end of section 1.

Mr. CULBERSON. "Provided, That section 1267 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed." I am trying to get the connection, if the Senator please.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Texas will listen for a moment——

Mr. TELLER. What is section 1267?

Mr. CULBERSON. It relates to the pay of a colonel.

Mr. TELLER. In the Army.

Mr. WARREN. That applies to the Army, but this amendment is to come in as new matter at the end of section 1.

The purpose of the amendment is to provide that section 1, if the bill shall pass, will not affect the pay of the active officers of the Navy, which it would do under existing law if not amended. The existing law provides that the pay of the officers of the Navy shall be the same as the corresponding officers of the Army, and the Naval Committee very properly have asked that they shall have charge of that part of it, and we are willing they should have.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, on the 14th of February I submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the pending bill, which I should like to have placed in the RECORD. Then, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that a bill will be presented in reference to the pay of the Navy, and in view of the amendment just offered by the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the committee, I withdraw the amendment. But I want it printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment is as follows:

Insert as a new section after section 2:

"SEC. 3. That hereafter the pay and allowances, except forage and mileage, which shall be governed by existing law, of officers of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Revenue-Cutter Service shall be the same in every respect, according to rank and length of service, as the pay and allowances of officers of corresponding rank and length of service of the Army."

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to the portion of section 1 of the proposed act increasing the pay of lieutenant-generals 5 per cent, major-generals 10 per cent, and brigadier-generals 15 per cent. I would be glad if the Senator would state why there is any necessity for increasing the pay of lieutenant-generals. I understand the salary now is $13,000 a year.

Mr. TELLER. How much?

Mr. CULBERSON. Thirteen thousand dollars a year.

Mr. WARREN. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Texas is mistaken.

Mr. TELLER. What is it?

Mr. WARREN. The pay is $11,000 or $11,500; I think the former. The pay of a general, if we had one, would be $13,000.

Mr. CULBERSON. The pay now of the lieutenant-general is how much?

Mr. WARREN. Eleven thousand dollars.

Mr. CULBERSON. Or $11,500. The Senator does not seem to be entirely satisfied as to which it is.

Mr. WARREN. I can inform the Senator in a moment. I think it is an even $11,000. It is difficult to carry all those figures in my mind. I can tell by looking at the table. It is $11,000, even.

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply wished to inquire of the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the chairman of the committee has accepted the amendment of the Senator from Texas, which makes section 2 provide that "the average pay of enlisted men of the Army as now established is hereby increased 40 per cent." Is not that the fact?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is my understanding that my amendment takes the place of the entire section 2.

Mr. WARREN. Exactly.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I wanted to inquire about.

Mr. WARREN. Exactly. In place of section 2 occurs the matter offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. TELLER. That is right. Now, Mr. President, I want to say a word or two about the bill.

I think myself that for many years we have kept our Army on a pay that has been very small, and it has been somewhat embarrassing, I know, to the military department of the Government to maintain a good, healthy organization except in time of war. I believe when the Spanish war broke out, or when it was in immediate prospect, we had no difficulty in filling up the ranks with proper men, and I presume that will always be the case.

It seems to me that when we have an army in the field in time of war or in time of peace we ought to pay a living rate to the soldiers. Of course, I understand that they get rations and clothing and all that, but I do not believe we have been doing a very fair thing by the soldiers.

Mr. President, I am very glad to see this bill come up. I suppose the legislation will really take place in the appropriation bill I hold in my hand, but I understood the Senator who has that bill in charge, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, wanted some expression from the Senate. I think he has had it pretty well. I have not heard complaint of this proposed increase of pay from anybody.

I objected the other day to the bill as brought in by the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the committee, not because it proposed to give too much pay, but because it had a principle in it that I thought was vicious. I expressed myself very briefly, and in answer there were some sneering comments to the effect that the country had not yet suffered any great disaster. Mr. President, I do not claim that if the bill had been enacted into law any deleterious effect would have been felt, and I do not claim that the provision of law that has been in existence for many years as to the Navy has probably had any deleterious influence on the public morals or the public interest.

But there is a very wide distinction between the Army and the Navy when it comes to allowing the President of the United States to increase the pay of the Army and to control that matter. If he can increase the pay to-day he can cut the pay down to-morrow. I believe in all times in every part of the world that has been recognized. It has always been recognized in every liberty-loving country that there was danger from the army. The history of the world has shown that in ages past great armies have determined who shall be the executive of the greatest and the most powerful nations of the world.

It is not popular, perhaps, in these days to make the suggestion that the Constitution of the United States provides three distinct departments of government—a legislative department, an executive department, and a judicial department. When the fathers of this Republic organized this system they acted wisely. There is no other government in the world of this kind except ours, unless it be, perhaps, some of the small republics of the world, where they have endeavored to pattern after us. What is more, there never was a government organized on the same plan that this Government has been organized. The founders of the Republic dealt with a new condition, a condition that never existed exactly as it existed when they created this Constitution of ours.

It may not be popular in these days, when we are urged to change the Constitution either by legislation or by judicial construction, to stand for the principles enunciated and heretofore recognized in the Constitution. We have had appeals from the executive department of the Government to increase the power of the executive department.

Mr. President, there is a way by which, if the American people want to increase the power of the Executive, it can be done. It can be done by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

There are two methods in which it can be done. You may do it by action of the National Legislature by submitting the question to the several States to be acted upon, and you may do it by creating a national convention for the purpose of changing the Constitution.

Yet, Mr. President, with that before us we have appeals from the executive department of the Government on more than one occasion that we should extend the power of the Executive either by legislative declaration or by judicial construction. I heard a Senator say, not long ago—and he is in the Chamber now—"I am not one of those who think that the old men who made the Constitution possessed all the wisdom of the world." Mr. President, I will venture to say here and to challenge contradiction, that at no time in the history of the world, either in the great countries of the East, like Greece and Rome, or at any other time, or in any other nation were there gathered together sixty-five men possessing the qualifications that these men possessed for the creation of a Constitution that has practically stood the test of a hundred years and more.

If I had time I should like to take up the membership of that convention, man by man, and show their character. It has been done repeatedly by historians, and I repeat it would be profitable to study the character of those men when they were there, and their conduct in after times supported the character they had when they made the Constitution. It would be profitable to study the character of the men as well as to study the character of this Constitution of ours.

Whenever the American people want to change the Constitution they will change it. They will not change it by submitting it to five men who sit on the bench to do it. They will not change it by the action of this body and the other. When they want it changed they will change it as they have a right to change it. They will change it by the method the fathers provided they should exercise when they wanted to change it.

Mr. President, I said, and I am not ashamed to repeat it, that if there is any threat of trouble to this country of ours it comes from a departure from the limitations of the Constitution. It comes from failing to recognize the duty that this body, as a legislative body, has to the country and to recognize the duty of the Executive toward this body and toward the people.

Mr. President, nobody will sneer me down by saying there is no danger of executive interference or executive change in the system of this Government. That has been the cry of all men who want to exercise arbitrary power. Buckle, the great historian, declared that power exercised by classes had never been exercised but what it was ultimately abused. I believe that that is the history of mankind. I could name you to-day the Roman emperor who went into power with a determination undoubtedly to serve the people and who came out of it a tyrant of the worst possible form.

Mr. President, there is not anything that will so degrade the human being as an exercise of arbitrary and unjust power. Buckle might have added to what he said of power exercised by a class of men that there was no history of the arbitrary exercise of executive power by any individual in which he did not ultimately demand more power than he originally started to exercise. The old Massachusetts Senator, Daniel Webster, was heard on this floor to put in a few lines the danger of executive power. I had his words in my desk, and I would have read them day before yesterday if I had had an opportunity. Webster said here in this body, long before some of the Members of the body were born:

> The contest of the ages has been to rescue liberty from the grasp of executive power.
> On the long list of the champions of human freedom there is not one name dimmed by the reproach of advocating the extension of executive power.

Mr. President, the lovers of liberty everywhere have warned the people against executive power. Our ancestors carefully guarded the executive power, and they carefully guarded the limitations between legislative and executive power. Just as long as we adhere to the lines laid down by the fathers of the Constitution in that written instrument, just so long may we hope for this young Republic. I speak of it as a young Republic. For while it has lived one hundred and thirteen years, I could call your attention to a republic that lived five hundred years and then went into despotism because of the failure to observe the limitations put upon executive power. I could call your attention to another nation supported by the most learned and civilized people of the world—ancient Greece—who maintained a republic for nine hundred years, and then went out of existence because of their failure to recognize the principles upon which they had established their government and maintained it for so many years.

Mr. President, if we maintain respect for the limitations provided by the Constitution, we may hope that this Republic will live as long as Greece lived and still be a Republic.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a communication from a banker who has a large business with officers in discounting their pay accounts, and while this banker makes a very comfortable living in that business he writes me in the interest of the pending bill. I will quote only a portion of it, because his letter is long. He says:

> To my personal knowledge, through years that I have been in this business, I find that the commissioned officers whose pay averages $157 a month have tried at least to rear their families and to educate their children, but at the end of their service, at the age of retiring, they go out with nothing perhaps but a small life-insurance policy. Many times those companies have failed, leaving the officer and his family almost destitute, with the exception of his small retired pay.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from West Virginia will proceed.

Mr. SCOTT. The writer says:

> I hope, Senator, you will do everything in your power for at least the junior officers who are now serving their country. They pay a discount, and are willing to do it, of 36 per cent a year—

Or 3 per cent a month for having their checks anticipated and discounted, and—

> I beg of you, while it may interfere with my business, to do something to relieve the necessities of these officers. I feel that if the Senate of the United States knew as I do the necessities of these deserving officers there would not be a dissenting vote against the present pay bill.

Mr. President, in addition to that, I want to speak for the private soldier, for whom I believe the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has fully provided in the increase of 40 per cent.

There are a few Senators, perhaps, on this floor who had the distinction of carrying a knapsack and gun. They know what it is and what it has been for a common soldier to serve his country at $13 a month. I certainly hope that in this bill being passed now, when it comes to be incorporated in the appropriation bill there will at least not be any reductions, but, if anything, that the increase proposed now in the pay of the noncommissioned officers and privates may be increased.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the bill which I ask, if adopted, shall constitute the second section of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add to the bill a new section, to be known as "section 2," to read as follows:

> That upon the death of any commissioned officer of the Army while in the line of duty there shall be paid to the widow, or to the widow and children, of such officer, or to his legal representative, if there be no widow or children, in addition to the arrearages of salary then due, an amount equal to two months of the salary which he was enjoying at the time of his death.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator offers that, I am perfectly willing to accept it.

Mr. BACON. I want to say one word about the amendment, Mr. President, and only one word.

The present law is one of very great hardship to the officers of the Army, and I do not think it is creditable to the Government of the United States. Under the law as it now exists an officer's pay stops on the day of his death. We know as a fact, and have had the fact emphasized by the letter which has just been read by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], that officers have not been able to do more than eke out a bare existence on the pay they have had, and even with the additions which we now propose to make to their pay they will not be able to accumulate anything.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Right along the line in which he is talking, the pay of the junior officers of the Army is so little that it even has been brought to the attention of the Commander in Chief and of the Secretary, who, while not undertaking to govern the matter, have recommended that they shall not marry until they at least arrive at the rank of captain.

Under our present lines of promotion captains are largely men away beyond 40, and sometimes they are 50 years of age. The consequence is that officers marry late in life, and so when an officer dies he leaves a widow usually without any money and a family of children at just the age when they need money most to educate them. I thank the Senator very much for his forethought in offering the amendment, which I most cheerfully accept, and I wish it were even more liberal.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have the amendment read.

Mr. WARREN. I did not wish to interrupt, only to say that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment at the request of the Senator from Colorado.

The Secretary read as follows:

> SEC. 2. That upon the death of any commissioned officer of the Army while in line of duty, there shall be paid to the widow, or to the widow and children, of such officer, or to his legal representative, if there be no widow or children, in addition to the arrearages of salary then due, an amount equal to two months of the salary which he was enjoying at the time of his death.

Mr. BACON. As I was proceeding to remark at the time of the interruption by the Senator from Wyoming, officers in the past have been unable to support themselves respectably or in a respectable style upon their salaries, even with the increased salary which is proposed in this bill. They will certainly never be able to accumulate anything to provide for the even temporary support of those whom they leave behind them as widows or children.

As I said, under the law, when an officer dies his pay stops on the very day of his death. There is no provision made in the law itself even for his burial, except, I think, that under either a law or some regulation of the Department $75 is allowed for that purpose—not enough to pay for the coffin in which an officer is buried.

Now, we do not deal in that way with any other branch of the Government. In our own case when a Senator or Representative dies, while there is no statute upon the subject, the universal custom is to give to the widow and children a year's pay. When an officer of the consular service or diplomatic service dies, there is always a liberal provision made in a bill by which there is to be paid to the widow and children or the personal representative of such diplomatic or consular officer a liberal sum. But in the case of a commissioned officer, who above all men is debarred from an opportunity to get any revenue from any other source except his salary, there is absolutely not a single day's pay allowed after his death.

I say very frankly, Mr. President, that if I thought the measure would have received the favorable consideration of the Senate, I would have proposed even more than that; but I feared that it might not be approved, and for that reason I limited it to two months' pay. I am very much gratified——

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. McLAURIN. I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia if there is any provision made for the payment of anything to the family of the enlisted man upon his death? If there is not any provision made for him, will the Senator be willing to amend his amendment by putting after the word "officer" wherever it occurs in the amendment the words "or enlisted man?"

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to that at all, though the necessity for it is not so great as in the case of the officer, for the reason that enlisted men are generally young men, a large majority of them not married, and the necessity for it is not so great. Very few of them die in the service except in time of war.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SCOTT. In reply to the Senator from Mississippi, I will state that in enlisting a soldier now he has to be a single man. The Government will not allow a man to enlist as a soldier who is a married man. He can reenlist if he has been married during his term of service, but a new man going into the Army has to be a single man.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to the provision if the Senator desires it, but I would prefer it should come in as an independent amendment. Let the two things stand each upon its own basis. I presume it is a fact that in a majority of instances when officers die, immediately succeeding their death their families are dependent upon their relatives for the support that they ought to have until provision can be made of a more permanent character.

While I do not wish to express any objection to the amendment as suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, I prefer that this should go through by itself. Then if the Senator desires to offer an amendment properly framed he can present it. I do not know how far conditions may require that there should be a different provision made for the enlisted men. We do know what the conditions are as to the officers. The enlisted man is certainly buried at the expense of the Government. The officer is not, and, as suggested by me and more definitely stated by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT], the enlisted men are not generally married men. They do not generally leave behind them those who are dependent.

It may be that the provision suggested by the Senator from Mississippi would require some little examination into conditions in order to determine exactly what should be done, but we do know what the conditions are as to the commissioned officers, and I therefore trust that the amendment may be acted upon independently of the consideration of the question as to what should be done in the case of the death of a private soldier.

I would be perfectly willing that an amendment should be adopted and would favor an amendment which would give that much pay, or even more, to anyone who should be found to be dependent upon an enlisted man at the time of his death, whether it be his mother or his wife and children, but I would prefer that the amendment as to officers should go through unless the Senator in charge of the bill thinks otherwise.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to suggest to him that I would just as freely, and I think members of the Military Affairs Committee and the Senate itself would just as freely, accept the amendment if made to cover three months' pay or possibly six months' pay—certainly for three months.

Mr. TELLER. Make it six.

Mr. BACON. I would prefer to make it six months.

Mr. SCOTT. That is what it ought to be.

Mr. BACON. I think it ought to be that. I should have framed it in that way in the beginning if I had been confident of the fact that it would have met with the approval of the Senate. I think it is as little as we can do. These men are the men who beyond all others are liable to sudden and unexpected death and the men of all others in the service of the Government who are debarred from the opportunity and the possibility of making provision against that day. I am very much gratified that the suggestion made by me for two months has met with a response which has suggested a change to six months, and I therefore, with the consent of the Senate, will modify my amendment and make it six months instead of two.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia modifies his amendment. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "month" strike out "two" and insert "six," so as to read "equal to six months of the salary."

Mr. McLAURIN. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia proposes to give to the widow, or widow and children, or, if there is no widow or any child, to give to the legal representative of the officer six months' additional pay. It does not make any distinction between married and unmarried officers. I do not think it ought to make any distinction between officers and enlisted men upon the ground that enlisted men can not be married men in the first instance. I do not see that there should be any distinction made, and I do not see any good reason for making a distinction.

The officer receives a great deal more pay than the private soldier, and to give the family or the legal representative of the officer six months' pay after he shall have died and to make no provision for the enlisted man seems to me to be a discrimination against the enlisted man that ought not to be made by Congress.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will limit his suggestion of an amendment to the case of a soldier who leaves a widow, or a widow and children, or children, or a dependent mother, I will agree to it. But it is frequently the case—it is most frequently the case—that the private soldiers have not these dependent relatives, and there are a great many instances in which they would even be without legal representatives, I presume.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I will agree to limit the amendment in behalf of the private soldiers as suggested by the Senator from Georgia, if he will make the same limitation in behalf of the officers.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I can see the Senator's idea of equity in his proposition and I honor him for wanting to put the pay of the private soldier on a comparative basis with the commissioned officer in that respect; but there is this difference: The commissioned officer is a man who has already given a number of years of his life in the service before he gets a commission. I am sorry to say that nearly every cadet on his graduation, after the buying of his uniform and arms, leaves West Point in debt. To allow the amendment to apply to those officers who are unmarried would simply be to protect their honor and their name by paying their debts. The enlisted man is a free agent working for a salary somewhere to-day, and enlisting to-morrow, and he may not remain in the Army more than one term of three years. So I think that we ought to make a distinction. I agree with the Senator, and should only be too glad to accept his proposition, so far as it provides for payment to the widow, or widow and children, or children, or dependent mother of the enlisted man; but I think it ought to be confined to them.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, there is a liberal allowance made——

Mr. WARREN. I might say also that an officer of the Army is not permitted to leave the service, unless, of course, he resigns his commission and loses the years to his credit, while an enlisted man every three years has his choice to reenlist at larger pay, or to go out.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I was about to say that there is a liberal allowance made by the law to the cadet while he is at the Military Academy performing the service, if it can be called service, that qualifies him for a commission in the Army. He is educated at the expense of the Government, and, while I may be mistaken in this particular, I understand that after he shall have served two or three years he can then resign, if he sees proper to do so, just exactly as the enlisted man can be discharged at the end of three years.

It may or may not be that the officer will have served a considerable length of time. He has gotten his education at the expense of the Government, and, under this amendment, if he dies within six months, or within three months, after he shall have been commissioned, his estate will get the benefit of it. The private soldier may have been in the service two years and ten months or eleven months and die, but his estate will get no benefit from it at all.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McLAURIN. With pleasure.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the Senator from Mississippi understands that a man must have completed his education sufficiently for all the ordinary walks of life before he can enter West Point. The examination is such that he must be a graduate from higher schools of learning.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I understand that he must have prepared himself sufficiently to enter into the fourth class at the Military Academy, but not that he shall have graduated at any other institution or that he shall have become a scholar before he enters that institution. It is true that he must have proceeded until he has acquired some proficiency in learning and letters before he can enter West Point, but after he enters there he is educated at the public expense. He is not only educated there, but he is given a liberal allowance while he is being educated.

I do think that there ought not to be made any such discrimination between the private soldiers and the officers as this amendment would make. I am willing for our Government to be liberal with its officers, and I think it is liberal with them after they have attained the rank of colonel or general, or probably lieutenant-colonel or major, or, in other words, after they have become field officers; but I do not think it ought to make such a great discrimination between the officer and the private soldier.

In this country it is presumed that one man is as good as another. It may be that he is a poor man, not able to get an education that would qualify him to enter the Army as a commissioned officer, but he ought to be treated as an American citizen, and this discrimination ought not to be made against any class of citizens.

I have no objection to a sum being paid to the widow and to the orphans of the officer who dies in the service of his country, but there ought also to be some provision made for the dependent relatives of the private soldier who dies in the service of his country. I therefore move to amend the amendment by adding, after the word "officer," wherever it occurs, the words "or enlisted man."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "officer," wherever it occurs in Mr. BACON's amendment, it is proposed to insert the words "or enlisted man."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I now ask that the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs to section 1 be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs is, in section 1, page 1, line 4, after the word "lieutenant-generals," to strike out "10" and insert "5;" and in line 5, after the word "major-generals," to strike out "and" and insert "10 per cent; of," so as to make the section read:

That the pay of officers of the Army is hereby increased as follows: Of lieutenant-generals, 5 per cent; of major-generals, 10 per cent; of brigadier-generals, 15 per cent; of colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors, 20 per cent; of captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants, 25 per cent; and the pay of cadets at the Military Academy is hereby increased 25 per cent: Provided, That section 1267 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 9, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 6, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

INVESTIGATION AS TO SUBMARINES.

Mr. DALZELL. I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 288.

Whereas Mr. GEORGE L. LILLEY, a Representative from the State of Connecticut, on his responsibility as a Member of this House, before the Committee on Rules, has among other things, stated in substance that the Electric Boat Company, of New Jersey, and their predecessors, the Holland Boat Company, have been engaged in efforts to exert corrupting influence on certain Members of Congress in their legislative capacities, and have, in fact, exerted such corrupting influence: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Members be appointed to investigate the charges made by said GEORGE L. LILLEY of corrupt practices on the part of said company and of Members of Congress with respect to legislation; and that said committee shall have authority to send for persons and papers, and to take testimony in Washington D. C., or elsewhere, either before the full committee or any subcommittee thereof. Said committee shall report as speedily as possible with such recommendation, if any, as to this committee shall seem meet.

Mr. DALZELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. DALZELL. All that I care to say upon the subject is embodied in a report, which is in print, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read, after which I want to say a word or two.

The Clerk read as follows:

To accompany House resolution 288.

On the 20th day of February last Mr. GEORGE L. LILLEY, a Representative from the State of Connecticut, introduced into the House a resolution calling for the appointment of a special committee of five Members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker, "to investigate the conduct of the Electric Boat Company of New Jersey and their predecessors, the Holland Boat Company, respecting the methods employed by said companies in connection with passed or proposed legislation before Congress."

There was nothing on the face of the resolution that charged corrupt or even improper methods on the part of the company or companies in connection with legislation or proposed legislation. On the day succeeding the introduction of the resolution, however, an article appeared in the Washington Post which did charge the companies named in the resolution with corrupt practices, and which quoted an interview on the subject with Mr. LILLEY, the author of the resolution. Thereafter numerous alleged interviews with Mr. LILLEY appeared in certain newspapers of the country coupling the names of Members of the House with the Electric Boat Company and legislation in its interest.

Following upon these publications, Mr. LILLEY at his own instance appeared before the Committee on Rules; admitted the authenticity of the interview in the Washington Post, but repudiated all others, and made a statement which is submitted herewith as part of this report.

In that statement charges are made of corrupt practices on the part of the Electric Boat Company influencing Members and legislation, and of such character, taken as a whole, as to lead your committee to conclude that it is due to the maintenance of the dignity and integrity of the House and its Members that an investigation into the charges made by Mr. LILLEY should be had. They therefore recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution.

Mr. DALZELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that attached to this report, which is in print, is a full account of the proceedings had before the Committee on Rules, including Mr. LILLEY'S statement, and also the Washington Post article, the genuineness of which he admitted. In printing this document a mistake was made at the Printing Office in marking it "Confidential." It was asked to be considered confidential until delivered to the House, and by mistake they marked it "Confidential." These reports can be had at the document room. I now ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOUTELL, Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, Mr. OLMSTED, Mr. HOWARD, and Mr. BROUSSARD.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Is there a gentleman representing the Committee on Claims present? The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have a bill reported from the Committee on Insular Affairs on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move, if he desires, that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Calendar.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider business on the Private Calendar in order to-day under the rule.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. WEEKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House to consider bills on the Private Calendar under the rule.

CATHOLIC CHURCH CLAIMS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to take up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. 16143) to provide for payment of the claims of the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of ——— dollars and ——— cents, the same to be paid to the archbishop of Manila, in the Philippine Islands, as the representative (and trustee) of the Roman Catholic Church in said islands; and that the acceptance of said sum, paid under the provisions of this act, shall be in full satisfaction of all claims for use and occupation of the property of said church in said islands and for damages done thereto by the military forces of the United States prior to the date, to wit, August 31, 1905, of the official report of the "Board on Church Claims," which said board, composed of John A. Hull, lieutenant-colonel, judge-advocate; Alexander O. Brodie, lieutenant-colonel, military secretary, and J. W. Moore, first lieutenant, Second Cavalry, was duly convened August 1, 1905, at headquarters Philippines Division in the city of Manila, in said islands, to consider and report upon said claims.

The following committee amendments were read:

In the blank space at the end of line 4, page 1 of the bill, insert the words "four hundred and three thousand and thirty."

In the blank space in line 5, page 1 of the bill, insert the word "nineteen."

In lines 12 and 13, page 1 of the bill, strike out the words "August 31, 1905," and insert in lieu thereof the words "January 15, 1906."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, this bill is what is known as the "Catholic Church claims bill." It provides for the payment of certain claims presented by the Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands for use and occupation of church property, and for the destruction of church property in the Philippine Archipelago. Shortly after the victory of Admiral Dewey at Manila the troops of the American Army landed in the Philippines.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, can we not have order? We can hear scarcely a word over here that the gentleman from Wisconsin is saying.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire how much time there is for this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has an hour, and the gentleman representing the minority will have an hour.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In view of the fact that there is a minority report, Mr. Chairman, I move that the time to be consumed on this side may be controlled by myself, and the time on the other side to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES]. Inasmuch as I see that Mr. JONES is not in his seat, I will ask that the time on that side be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be divided equally, one-half to be controlled by him and the other half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. PAYNE. What time is to be divided?

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate.

Mr. PAYNE. The committee can not fix the time for general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, it may be divided by unanimous consent.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he will have no difficulty about the time. He has the control of one hour and he can yield such part of that as he desires.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I was apprehensive that the time might not be so easy to arrange.

Mr. TAWNEY. In the absence of any agreement in the House the Chair has control of the time for general debate and recognition.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary situation about it is that anybody who gets the eye of the Speaker has an hour. Now, if you want to make an agreement contrary to that, it is well and good. The gentleman from Wisconsin has an hour, and then anybody who gets recognition has an hour.

Mr. COCKRAN. And the members of the committee have the preference.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And members of the committee have preference.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have just this moment come into the Chamber, and I would like to have my friend, the chairman of the committee [Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin] state what the situation is.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 16143, to provide for the payment of Catholic Church claims in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. And any arrangement made for debate?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have made a motion that the committee rise in order that the House may fix a time for general debate and the time to take a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to. Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEEKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16143) to provide for payment of the claims of the Roman Catholic Church of the Philippine Islands and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16143, and at the hour of 4.30 the committee rise and report the bill to the House and that a vote be taken. And pending that, I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16143. And pending that motion, the gentleman moves to close general debate at what time?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. At 4.30, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Virginia, who represents the minority, and myself.

Mr. MANN. General debate on what?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. On bill H. R. 16143.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not make any such motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole has reported that that committee have had this bill under consideration and have come to no resolution thereon. Now it is in order for the gentleman to move to close general debate upon this bill at a given time.

Mr. MANN. That is what I asked as a parliamentary inquiry, what they were going to close debate upon. The motion the gentleman made was to close general debate, when we are going into Committee on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Wisconsin moves to close general debate upon this bill at 4.30 o'clock. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that his motion to close general debate is in order, but this bill will then be read under the five-minute rule for amendment. Will the gentleman state his motion again?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will accept a suggestion to close general debate at 4 o'clock. I presume he wants to conclude his bill to-day, and if he closes general debate at 4 o'clock there will be a chance for debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In view of the fact that there is only one paragraph in the bill, and that the amendments are very simple indeed, I did not suppose there would be much necessity to discuss it under the five-minute rule; but in view of what gentlemen say around me, I will move that general debate close at 4 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all general debate close upon this bill at 4 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order now for the gentleman to ask unanimous consent that the time in general debate be equally divided between the two sides, one half to be controlled by himself, and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That was my original request. I ask that the time be equally divided, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time be equally divided between the majority and the minority, one half of it to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. WEEKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House to consider bills on the Private Calendar. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is recognized to discuss the bill H. R. 16143. General debate is limited until 4 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, this bill, reported by the Committee on Insular Affairs, provides for the payment of the claims of the Catholic Church in the Philippines for the use and occupancy of property of that church in the islands, and also for damages done to the same by United States troops during the insurrection.

It is an important measure, not only in the amount of money appropriated, but also because of some of the questions involved.

In the year 1898 our troops landed in the Philippine Islands, and from that time on took possession of churches, parish houses, schoolhouses, and other buildings belonging to the Catholic Church and used them for prisons, hospitals, or barracks. Some of these buildings were fine structures, costing many thousands of dollars. The cathedral at Manila and other similar buildings were notable in architecture and interior adornment.

After hostilities ceased the occupation of these buildings had to be continued until suitable quarters could be erected for the troops which remained in the archipelago, the entire time of the occupancy varying in individual cases from a few weeks to two years or more. This occupation was exclusive, entirely preventing the church authorities from taking measures to protect the property. Some of the buildings thus seized and occupied were seriously damaged, others partially or wholly destroyed.

Claims for damages and for use and occupancy were presented by the Catholic Church authorities to the Government of the United States. Thereupon the Government, through the War Department, issued an order convening a board called "The board on church claims" for the sole purpose of making an investigation and report.

This board consisted of Lieut. Col. J. A. Hull, judge-advocate; Lieut. Col. Alexander O. Brodie, military secretary, and First Lieut. J. W. Moore, Second Cavalry, all of the United States Army. They met August 1, 1905, at the headquarters of the Philippines Division, in the city of Manila, and entered upon what proved to be a very exhaustive investigation, continuing upwards of six months. Lieutenant-Colonel Hull, who, by the way, is a son of our colleague on this floor, the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, was one of the witnesses before the Committee on Insular Affairs during the hearings on the pending bill.

I know that I voice the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Insular Affairs when I say that in its judgment the work of the board on church claims was most conscientious, painstaking, and thorough, and that it was conducted with conspicuous ability. [Applause.] The award of the board carefully excluded all compensation, first, for damages incident to military operations; second, for damage done by the insurgents; third, wanton damages by soldiers of the American army; fourth, for use and occupancy by servants of the civil government.

Of the total number of cases presented by the Catholic Church, aggregating between four and five hundred in number, the board entirely excluded from consideration fifty-nine, holding in these that no rent was due, and that the damage, if any, was done by the enemy, or that it was an incident of actual warfare. The total amount of claims presented by the Catholic Church in the Philippines was $2,442,963.13, and the total amount awarded by the board was $363,030.19.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Now that order has been restored, I wish the gentleman would state again the amount of claims and the amount allowed by the board. I was unable to catch the figures.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The total amount claimed by the church was $2,442,963.13; the total amount awarded by the board was $363,030.19.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And the bill which you are advocating followed the report of the board and reported that amount?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I intended to reach that point a little later, but I will digress now and answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts. In addition to this award of $363,030.19, which was for damages and for use and occupancy only, the board found that there had been a loss also of articles of cult and ornamentation, for which the church claimed $298,222.50.

This board, however, reported that in so far as the American army was concerned the testimony concerning the loss of such articles did not warrant them in suggesting a larger amount by way of compensation than $40,000. A majority of the Committee on Insular Affairs saw fit, in the exercise of its judgment and in view of the very conservative award for damages and for use and occupancy, to add the $40,000 to the $363,030.19. In this connection I call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts and other gentlemen to the testimony of the witnesses before the Committee on Insular Affairs as to the award of the board. From page 73 of the hearings I read the testimony of Mr. Secretary Taft, a witness thoroughly familiar with the facts relating to these claims:

I think that $363,000 is much too low for rent and damages in occupation by our troops. It is much too low, because of the difficulty of bringing in evidence so long after the event. I think the board went through the matter with great care. But there are a great many claims filed in excess of the $363,000 that, nearer to the event, might have been proven. The burden of course was on the claimants; but with the immense loss that the church suffered from war, and other causes, I am quite sure that the increase of $363,000 to a half a million or more would be no injustice.

Maj. John Biddle Porter, judge-advocate United States Army, who served in the islands in command of troops which occupied some of this property, said in his testimony before the Committee on Insular Affairs:

Major PORTER. I think the award is extremely conservative, Mr. Chairman; that is my opinion of it. I have no interest in it one way or another, but the impression made on my mind from what I have seen in the Philippines during the two years and a half that I was in the islands is that the estimates were very moderate, particularly considering the difficulty of replacing the property destroyed.

Colonel Hull, on page 103, said, concerning the award of the board:

Mr. WASHBURN. There is one question that I would like to ask Colonel Hull. If this $363,000 award was a fair one at the time it was made by the Commission, should anything be added to that because of deterioration of property between that time and the time that this matter is acted upon?

Mr. MCKINLAY. Material is higher and labor is higher. There has been an advance in prices ever since that award was made.

Colonel HULL. That award was based not on the value at the time it was made (1905–6), but it was based on the value at the time of the occurrence (1898–1902). I probably have a more intimate knowledge of these claims than any other one man. I have gone over them all, and I know them intimately. I am confident that $500,000 would not be an excessive award at this time.

He went on a little later to speak of the enormous loss that the Catholic Church has suffered because of our occupation of the Philippines.

I now call your attention to the testimony of a very distinguished witness, Bishop Rooker, an American bishop sent to the archipelago to supersede a Spanish ecclesiastic. Bishop Rooker, whom many on the floor knew well while he was a resident of Washington, testified:

This subsequent deterioration has not been included in the claims which have been presented. The repairs to-day would be much more than at time of damage. For example: If the claim made for damages in the parish of Maasin (case 369), amounting to ₱2,000, had been paid at the time they were made the amount would have restored the property to its original condition; to-day that restoration would cost not less than ₱10,000.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, it would be interesting to know if the Committee on Insular Affairs considered the matter from that standpoint. Did the committee follow absolutely the report of the board?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Followed absolutely the report of the board. I am speaking of this only for the purpose of showing the uniform care and conservatism of the board when making this award.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Did not the chairman of the committee feel, or did not the committee feel, that those suggestions might have been considered with reference to raising the award that seemed very reasonable, as the gentleman states?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I wish to say this frankly in reply to that suggestion—and it is very pertinent, the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE]—that I did not favor what I was instructed to report—the allowance of $40,000 for loss of articles of ornamentation, on the theory that they had been taken away by our soldiers. But I am perfectly willing, and I think it only my duty under my oath as a Representative in Congress to vote that additional $40,000 by way of legitimate compensation to the church for use and occupation and for damage to these properties. I therefore shall vote the amount appropriated in the bill, but with the distinct understanding that I vote it upon the theory that I have just announced.

Mr. HINSHAW. What proportion of this sum that is sought to be appropriated here would probably be a reasonable compensation for the rent of the buildings occupied by the men of the United States forces?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The board awarded three hundred and sixty-three thousand and a fraction dollars.

Mr. HINSHAW. For the rent?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. For the rent, occupancy, and damage.

Mr. HINSHAW. So that sum would not really compensate for the destruction of the property?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That only includes rent and damages.

Mr. COCKRAN. I would like the question propounded by the gentleman from Nebraska repeated.

Mr. HINSHAW. The question I sought to make plain was the amount of the proposed award here which is justly attributable to the rental value of the land, and how much for the church structure.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If my memory serves me right, the amount allowed for rent alone is $306,000 and the damages about fifty-seven or fifty-eight thousand dollars, approximately, the aggregate being $363,000 and a fraction for the two items.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Upon what theory is it that the church claims $2,000,000 and the award was only $306,000?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The claims as originally presented comprised many items which the board entirely refused to consider. Claims were presented for use and occupation and for damages not only by our own forces, but also by the forces of the insurgents. The board excluded all compensation for damages by the insurgents; they also excluded all compensation for damages incidental to military operation. These were included in the claims. They excluded also claims for wanton damages by soldiers of the Army.

These were included in the claims. And they excluded compensation for use and occupancy and damages by servants of the civil government, all of which were included in the claims. Striking out these items greatly reduced the amount of the award.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Why was it necessary to put the soldiers in the churches?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It was necessary to put the soldiers in the churches because in almost every barrios the only buildings suitable, strong, and safe for soldiers to occupy were the church edifices. Many of them were massive stone structures, built like fortresses.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It was not necessary to use the churches for protection against the enemy?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Sometimes; yes, sir. They used them also as barracks, as hospitals, and prisons. In one of them they had for a time 4,000 Spanish prisoners.

As to these buildings, Secretary Taft says:

Now, in the Philippines, in a good many of the villages, the only buildings of strong material—to use the expression they use there—are the churches and conventos, the convento being what we call the rectory, the priest's house. This is ordinarily a building nearly as large as the church, with a good many rooms in it—a place in which entertainments are given, and in which the people have a sense of ownership, and which in the olden times was used, really, as the only hotel in which to entertain people. It was the only building, therefore, adapted for the occupation of the troops, unless they used the church. And so it was that these rectories in the islands, and especially in those villages where the priests had been driven away, were used by the American troops.

We had to use these buildings that we might have suitable hospitals and barracks for our soldiers and safe places to keep our prisoners. I will ask that I be allowed to proceed without interruption, in view of the fact that a number of the members of the Committee on Insular Affairs desire to be heard.

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WANGER. Is what you term "rent" a designation of rent or is it compensation for use and occupation?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is for use and occupation.

Mr. Chairman, just a word as to the work which has been done in the archipelago by the bishops and the clergy by way of assisting the Federal Government in bringing about and maintaining order in the islands. I have here an extract from the annual report of the governor of the province of Samar. I call particular attention of gentlemen of the committee to the language of the governor, Hon. George Curry, in his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906. The province of Samar has been one of the most warlike of any in the archipelago. It was in this province some years ago that occurred the horrible massacre of United States soldiers. Here is what the governor says:

In the municipal elections in December last for consejales for all of the thirty-two towns there were only two contests, and in the seven newly created municipalities, where all of the municipal officials were elected, there was but one contest, as the law had not been complied with in registering the voters. There were no disturbances of any kind and the elections were held in a very orderly manner.

There have been no religious disturbances of any kind in this province. All of the people being members of the Roman Catholic Church, they have been visited by the Right Rev. Thomas A. Hendrick, bishop of Cebu, who exercises great influence over the people of the island of Samar, and whose influence has always been exercised in the interests of good government; in fact, I believe that the influence of Bishop Hendrick has done much to bring about the good results that have been obtained in this province, and that, with two or three missionaries in the interior working under the direction of Bishop Hendrick, the results obtained will be permanent.

Here is a copy of a letter sent to Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, in command of our division in the Philippines, by Gen. James F. Smith, the governor-general of the islands, dated March 5, 1907:

MARCH 5, 1907.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I have just received several telegrams from Governor De Veyra stating that the native clergy are lending great assistance in securing surrender of Pulahans. This is largely due to the influence of Bishop Hendrick. He informs me, however, that many officers, both Regular Army and constabulary, are disposed to look upon the native clergy with suspicion. Would it be too much trouble to have the commanding officer of Leyte call the attention of the officers and men to the fact that these clergy are rendering valuable assistance and that their efforts should be encouraged?

Sincerely,

JAMES F. SMITH,
Governor-General.

Maj. Gen. LEONARD WOOD, U. S. A.,
Commanding Philippines Division, Manila, P. I.

Colonel Hull, in his testimony before our committee, said of Bishop Rooker of the diocese of Iloilo:

Colonel HULL. He died since I left the islands.

The CHAIRMAN. He was formerly stationed in Washington, was he not?

Colonel HULL. He was probably known to a great many of the members of the committee. He was the Doctor Rooker who was secretary of the papal delegation here. He was one of the best-known Washingtonians, a man who was invited everywhere on account of his wit and mental activity, and I think that it would not be out of place to call the attention of the committee, although you may not desire to have it go in the record——

The CHAIRMAN. I want you to state, so that it may go into the record, his mode of life there, his influence in the church, and how he died.

Colonel HULL. I did not have the pleasure of knowing Doctor Rooker at the time that he was in this country. I did meet him in the Philippines as the Bishop of Jaro. I have had a great many personal talks with him, and I know that the man was bending every energy that he could to fix up the buildings and the cause of education in his diocese. I know that the man lived in conditions entirely different from that usually supposed bishops enjoy, on account of expense, and he felt that he could better use the money for buildings and education than he could for living; and I know that the man went hungry, and I have no doubt that his death was probably hastened from the fact that he starved himself for the benefit of his diocese. I know that at times he did not have enough to eat.

* * * * * * *

I was there one time, and he told me that he was sorry that he could not have me to lunch that day because he had nothing but native food, and he would not care to offer that to an American; he did not think it was fit to serve to a friend. He lived on fish, rice, and other things that are not palatable to one who has not been thoroughly educated to them.

Bishop Hendrick's testimony was as follows:

The priests and the bishops have no salaries. Where churches have been destroyed the people are worshiping in huts made of bamboo and grass, hoping for some help from elsewhere. The people are exceedingly poor everywhere.

When I heard Colonel Hull give that testimony of the life led by Bishop Rooker there came to my mind the saying of George Eliot, that—

The growing good of the world is partly dependent upon unhistoric acts; and that things are not so ill with you and me as they might have been is partly owing to those who lived faithfully a hidden life and rest in unvisited tombs.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now to call attention to some of the statements in the report of the minority.

Mr. PAYNE. Before the gentleman goes to that, I understand that the real basis of this claim is a legal one; that the Catholic Church is the owner of the property, that the Government of the United States in suppressing the rebellion took possession of that property, and that it became injured while in possession of the Government, and that the claim itself is for the rents and the injuries to the property, a claim well recognized in the books as a part of the burden of the Government. Is not that true?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; but there are many things said in the report of the minority to which I wish to refer briefly.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I know; but the decision of the courts was based on the ground that the church owned the property, and also on the ground that the United States, being a tenant of the church, could not dispute the title; but the courts traced the legal title to the Catholic Church, to whom you propose to pay this money. Is not that correct?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The equitable title only, it is claimed by the minority of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. But the courts trace the legal title. I have read the prevailing opinion, and I have not any question but what it was the legal title that vested in the Catholic Church, they having the right to claim the property and the use of it, certainly, without any question.

Mr. OLMSTED. And that in any event we occupied as their tenants and could not dispute their title.

Mr. PAYNE. That was another branch of the decision. They put it on both grounds.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the minority report makes a forceful reference to the friars and their claims. But the friar claims were expressly and entirely excluded from consideration by the Committee on Insular Affairs, and they have nothing to do with the pending bill.

The work of the board which we considered had no reference whatever to the friars' claims, and therefore any reference or discussion of them at this time is not germane.

The minority of the committee assert also that there are many hundreds of other church claims, Catholic and Protestant, now pending before Congress which have been waiting for a long time. In reply to this statement of the minority I need only to suggest that the fact that there are a number of other claims demanding attention by Congress does not in any way affect the validity or merit of the claims now before us. The only thing here before us is whether the claims appropriated for by this bill ought or ought not to be paid. There may be a hundred other worthy claims that have not been considered, but that ought not to deter us from paying these just claims of the Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands.

Now, in view of what the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said to me, I wish to say that there is another phase of this question—a very important one; more important than that the gentleman has mentioned. The minority of the committee—and there are four members of the minority—united in declaring that there is an Independent Catholic Church in the Philippines which claims consideration in connection with these claims. Let us understand about the origin and character of the Independent Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands.

On page 20 Colonel Hull says that the Independent Church in the Philippine Islands was not organized—was never heard of—until after the time covered by the award of the board on church claims. This award covers damages for use and occupancy from 1898 to 1902. That Philippine church, the Independent Church, was not organized until after these claims had accrued.

Instructive testimony concerning this church was given by Colonel Hull. I will read the questions and answers, so that gentlemen may get thoroughly in mind the essential facts concerning the Independent Church in the islands:

The CHAIRMAN. Let us have a distinct understanding as to what was meant by the Independent Catholic Church in the Philippines. When was that church first heard of there?

Colonel HULL. Along about the latter part of the summer, or in the early fall of the year 1902.

The CHAIRMAN. That was after our occupancy of the Islands?

Colonel HULL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was Aglipay?

Colonel HULL. He was a sort of vicar-general, at one time, of the diocese of Vigan, under the Roman Catholic Church.

The CHAIRMAN. That was prior to the war, and before our occupancy?

Colonel HULL. It was after our occupancy—say, August, 1898, to March, 1899. The insurgents seized the Bishop of Vigan and carried him to the mountains, and he subsequently died of hardships that were placed upon him by the insurgents.

The CHAIRMAN. The Bishop of Vigan of the Catholic Church?

Colonel HULL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Not of the Independent Church?

Colonel HULL. No, no; that was before the Independent Church had started. Then Aglipay joined the insurrection as a general of the insurrectionary forces, and he had the reputation among the Americans of being a very bloodthirsty individual. He surrendered, finally, to the American authorities and shortly afterwards started the so-called "Independent Catholic Church."

Concerning Archbishop Aglipay, the head of the Independent Catholic Church, Colonel Hull testified:

The CHAIRMAN. And this man, who had the reputation of being a bloodthirsty individual, was the head of the Independent Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands?

Colonel HULL. Yes, sir. I might add that it was frequently reported that he was guilty of burying American soldiers alive if they fell into his hands as captives.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the possession of these churches by the Independent Catholic Church, at the head of which was Aglipay—this man who had the reputation of burying our soldiers alive—was what——

Mr. DRISCOLL. Has the gentleman the exact date of that surrender?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It was after we went there. On page 139 of the hearings is more information. I will read:

Mr. GARRETT. I want to ask Colonel Hull this question in view of the answer just given by him: At the time for which you made these awards, was there any Independent Church there?

Colonel HULL. No, sir.

Mr. GARRETT. There was no Independent Church for the time that you made these awards?

Colonel HULL. No, sir.

Mr. GARRETT. The organization of the Independent Church has all come since the time of our occupancy for which these awards were made?

Colonel HULL. Yes, sir; unless in one or two particular cases, where we have kept scouts; but as a very general proposition, I should say that it was afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. During the time that these damages were inflicted there was no Independent Catholic Church in the Philippines?

Colonel HULL. No, sir.

Mr. HELM. Perhaps it is a little bit apart from the Colonel's office, but it occurs to me, and I would like to ask him if it would be possible out of abundant precautions that there would be an award made, that a case could be prepared and presented to this Manila court, or to whatever court prevails over there, and have it adjudicated thoroughly and completely as to whom this money should be paid? Could that be done? Would it be possible?

Colonel HULL. For what purpose? What claims are you afraid of?

Mr. HELM. There seems to have been some confusion or some misunderstanding as to who was the proper person in each instance to whom to pay this money. Could that not be all adjudicated or determined conclusively by the court in a certain case?

Colonel HULL. It could be determined conclusively by the War Department, without the necessity of an investigation by judicial process, by securing any necessary quittance of every legal authority of the Catholic Church.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. I think that I can ask a question which will clear up part of the doubt in your mind, Mr. Helm. Let me ask the Colonel this: Has the Independent Catholic Church ever presented a demand for damages to any property mentioned in any of these claims?

Colonel HULL. No, sir; and there is a document on record, secured from Aglipay by an officer whose name I do not now recall, stating that no such claims were contemplated.

The CHAIRMAN. That being true, the only claimant who has asked compensation for damages on the property mentioned in your itemized report is the Roman Catholic Church of the Philippine Islands?

Colonel HULL. Yes, sir; of which there are only five owners—the bishops.

There is only one possible way by which the Independent Catholic Church could have acquired title to the church property in the islands. That would be upon the assumption or theory that before we went to the Philippines the title to church property there was in the Spanish Government and that by virtue of the treaty of Paris such title passed to the United States Government and through the United States Government to the Independent Catholic Church. But the United States has never made any claim to this property; it has never transferred or attempted to transfer any property claimed by the Roman Catholic Church.

So, then, the sole question is this: Prior to the treaty of Paris, was the title to the church property in the Spanish Government? And if so, is it now in the United States Government? This assumption that the title to church property in the Philippines passed from Spain to the United States by the treaty of Paris, has been given attention in the supreme court of the islands in an opinion by Justice Willard, in the case of Barlin, bishop, etc., plaintiff, v. Ramirez, ex-rector, etc., and the municipality of Laganoy, defendants. This case was brought in 1904 under the act of 1901, which gave the courts of first instance the right to try questions of title to, and right of possession of, real estate in the Philippines. The complaint alleged the title in the Roman Catholic Church. The defendant in his answer denied such ownership and alleged title in the province of Laganoy, That province being given permission to intervene, filed its pleading in intervention, alleging that it owned the property in question. The plaintiff thereupon replied to this complaint, or answer in intervention, and denied ownership in the province of Laganoy. The court of first instance decided that the plaintiff was entitled to possession of the property in question, and an appeal was taken to the supreme court.

The supreme court of the Philippine Islands, with the allegation of ownership in the province made and denied and of ownership in the church made and denied, used the following language in its decision dated November 24, 1906, more than a year after the date of the act of 1905 conferring original jurisdiction on the supreme court to hear and determine cases, including questions of title to church property:

> We have said that it (that is, the municipality of Laganoy) could have no such title or ownership even admitting that the Spanish Government was the owner of the property and that it passed by the treaty of Paris to the American Government. But this assumption is not true. As a matter of law, the Spanish Government at the time the treaty of peace was signed was not the owner of this property or of any other property like it situated in the Philippine Islands.

The supreme court declares that Spain was not the owner of this property "nor of any other like it situated in the Philippine Islands," and the court based this declaration not upon the facts of that particular case, but upon its construction of the Spanish written law governing the status of all property in the Philippine Islands. They decided it not as a question of fact—that is, that particular fact—but as a question of law in construing the Spanish statutes. The treaty of Paris confirmed all property rights, either of title or possession, which were guaranteed under the Spanish law. No one will deny that all property in the Philippine Islands before we went there which was devoted to religious purposes was in the exclusive control, possession, and occupancy of the Roman Catholic Church. Even if we were to disregard this decision of the supreme court of the islands, no one can truthfully say that the relation of the Spanish Government to any of the property concerned by these claims was anything else than that of a mere trustee.

Therefore the United States could have no title except that of a mere trustee. The United States Government can not and ought not to hold title to property as the trustee of any religious organization, Catholic or Protestant. We hold that, throwing aside this decision of the supreme court of the Philippine Islands, the equitable title has always been and now is unquestionably in the Roman Catholic Church, and that this money should be paid to that organization.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman is there any suit now pending in this court that has been given jurisdiction over this matter between these two churches in the Philippine Islands, upon a decision in which case it is expected that this matter may be determined differently from what it has already been decided?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We have the testimony of Colonel Hull here that the archbishop of that church, the head of it, Aglipay, filed a paper with the American authorities in the islands in which he expressly disavowed any intention of making any claim for damages to this property. The independent church has never filed any claim and does not intend to file any.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I understand the claim of the Roman Catholic Church is predicated on a decision of the supreme court over there, which it is claimed was made prior to the time when original jurisdiction was given to the court to determine this matter.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; that is a mistake. Now, here is an important fact for the gentlemen of the committee to bear in mind. This decision of the supreme court of the Philippine Islands in which they held in express language that the title to all the church property in the Philippine Islands was in the Roman Catholic Church, was made in November, 1906. It was on appeal.

But the statute which conferred upon the supreme court original jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine such cases was passed in July, 1905, a year and several months before it rendered this decision on the question of title on appeal, so that this court must have had in mind that statute of 1905. Even the dissenting opinion does not seem to doubt the right of the court to render that decision, notwithstanding the statute of 1905.

Mr. Chairman, I have now occupied more time than I intended to. There is another case which has been decided since, and attention to it will be called by the gentleman who will follow me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I ask the gentleman a question for information before he takes his seat? It is this: What has the committee done or what can be done to see to it that this money shall go to the repairs of the buildings that were injured by the Government? I do not think the House would care so much as to exactly who the beneficiary is or who the trustee is, provided that, for the benefit of the village or the city or the hamlet where these buildings are, they are repaired. I think the letter of Governor Taft of January 20, 1903, really leaves it a question of possession rather than a question of title. So how can this committee know that this money if paid to a certain Roman Catholic bishop will actually be appropriated to the repair of that damage done by the troops of the Government?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will answer that question by quoting from the testimony of men best qualified to answer. Colonel Hull, on page 15 of the hearings of the committee, said:

> Colonel HULL. I have no hesitancy in answering that question emphatically. I have no doubt but that any amount of money that may be received will be spent in the reconstruction of church property in the individual towns.

He also says:

> Colonel HULL. I can answer that question, I think, very fully. I have talked with, I think, almost every priest in the island and with every bishop, and I know the purpose and intention of the Papal delegate in case of payment. Any amount of money that is paid there will be spent in the individual localities in the reconstruction of church property.

Gen. Clarence Edwards, who was sitting by, interrupted to say:

> There is no question about that.

General Edwards said in addition:

> When I was in the Philippines the last time with the Secretary I found that the archbishop was not any too anxious to assume this responsibility, but it should be borne in mind that there is an American archbishop with four bishoprics under him. They are harmonious in any decision they might make, or if the money be turned over to the archbishop, and he is not at all keen to have this done; in other words, just as Colonel Hull has said, he does not care about adjudicating these matters with the different churches, although it strikes me that that is the most practicable way. Any lump award would be made to the archbishop and he would reconcile the various amounts according to the dioceses under him, the four dioceses presided over by the bishops, and therefore if they are willing to turn over the lump sum they will have to be willing to adjudicate those various claims. So there is no contention among the various churches; they are perfectly harmonious, under the church control over them, as to the acceptance of this money.

Now, then, if the gentleman will permit me, I absolutely insist that I close right now by saying this additional word. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall make no law for the establishment of religion. Now, have we a right to appropriate money out of the Treasury of the United States and specifically provide that it shall go to the building of Presbyterian churches or Methodist churches or Catholic churches? Have we anything else to do than to appropriate money to compensate for damages which we have inflicted? We do not ordinarily say in a judgment in a circuit court, or in any other court, to the man who succeeds in getting it, "We will give you this amount of money if you will use it in a certain way." The man upon whose property the damage is inflicted is entitled to compensation in money, and he takes the money and does with it as he pleases.

Therefore it is much better not to limit to this province or that province the expenditure of the money to be here appropriated. Railroads are being built, conditions are changing, and it may be that some of these hamlets will gradually be transferred from their present location to the vicinity of the railroads, and it may be necessary to build these churches miles away from where they are now.

Mr. COCKRAN. If the gentleman will allow me, Mr. Chairman, I would like to give an answer to that question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin reserve the balance of his time?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman yields to me just enough time to answer the question propounded here concerning the use to which this fund may be put.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields to the gentleman from New York to answer a question.

Mr. COCKRAN. I desire to answer that question propounded to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] by this statement: Wherever the organization of the Catholic Church extends there is one solemn vow which every bishop must take at the moment of his consecration, and that is to guard, as a precious deposit, all the church property that may come into his custody while he exercises the episcopal function. That oath, which is a feature of his consecration, is exacted as much against temptations to use church property himself for his own profit as against any surrender of it by him to others, no matter who may seek to invade it. There is no power anywhere on earth under the canon law—that is to say, under the very constitution of the church—that can take from a diocese a single penny coming to it from any source for ecclesiastical purposes. The Pope himself has no such authority. The bishop is prohibited under a solemn vow from attempting such a diversion himself or suffering anyone else to effect it. The moment a fund reaches his hands, at that instant, under every obligation of his office, affirmed as a distinct solemnity of his consecration, he becomes its trustee, to use it solely for ecclesiastical purposes, and transmit it intact to his successor for the benefit of those falling within that particular episcopal jurisdiction.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the gentleman seriously think that answers my question? This House can not deal with a few bishops, nor an individual party, nor the church itself. It must be its own judge as to who this money shall go to, and, if necessary, by commission remedy the wrongs that this Government did.

Mr. COCKRAN. Why, Mr. Chairman, the property having been in the custody of the church, if return is to be made and compensation given for the use of it, surely the amount must go to the person or body who held the legal title.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the gentleman will pardon me, if you will read page 4 of the minority report, the language of Judge Taft, you will see that he gives a statement which is strictly true as to the decision of this great question.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman is now referring——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair reminds the gentleman from Wisconsin that this is being taken from his time.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] who presents the report of the minority can probably state that objection, based on his own report, better than anybody else, and we might as well hear it from him now.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, there are two or three excellent reasons which can be advanced against the payment to the Roman Catholic Church of the $403,030.19, recommended in the report which accompanies this bill. It is well known that since the year 1902 there has existed in the Catholic Church of the Philippines a most serious schism, which has resulted in dividing that church into two branches—the Roman Catholic Church and the Independent Filipino Catholic Church. The rites, ceremonies, and manner of worship in these two branches, or separate and independent Catholic churches, are the same. The only difference between them is that the Independent Filipino Church does not recognize the authority of the Pope of Rome. Since the organization of the Independent Filipino Church a bitter controversy has been waged between the two over the right to the use and occupation of the six or seven hundred church edifices which are scattered over the thirty-four civilized provinces of the islands. To this moment this question, which involves the ownership and possession of church properties worth many millions of dollars, has not been judicially determined. In my judgment, it should be so determined before Congress undertakes to pay any sum for the use and occupation of and for damages inflicted upon the four hundred and odd churches and other church buildings embraced in this report. The Philippine government has never undertaken to decide this bitterly controverted question, but, on the contrary, has expressly relegated it to the supreme court of the islands. That this court has never decided it is, in my opinion, equally clear.

In January, 1903, the Hon. W. H. Taft, then civil governor of the Philippines, realizing, as he declared, that the conflicting claims in respect to church property might result in attempts to dispossess those in charge of the various churches and consequent disturbance of the peace, issued an order the purpose and effect of which was that where the Roman Catholic Church or its representatives was in actual possession of church property that possession should not be disturbed, and where the Independent Filipino Church or its representatives was in possession that possession should be respected until the question could be finally determined by the courts. Acting under that order the members of the Independent Catholic Church of the Philippine Islands retained possession of the churches and conventos of which they then had possession, and the members of the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church, where they were in possession of churches and other church property, retained possession of the same. In other words, Secretary Taft, then civil governor of the Philippines, realizing that unless such an order was issued there would be waged throughout the Philippines a bloody controversy between the two branches of the Catholic Church as to the possession of church property, determined to see that those in actual possession of the various properties should be protected in that possession until a question of such transcendent importance as this should be determined judicially and finally.

Accordingly he issued the order which is presented in the views of the minority. And in the year 1905, on the 24th of July, the Philippine government enacted a law which conferred upon the supreme court of the Philippine Islands original jurisdiction to hear and determine every question relating to the right of possession and ownership of all church property in the islands. This property was, as I have said, located in thirty-four different provinces. In order to avoid a multiplicity of suits the act provided the means by which one suit might determine the ownership and possession of all the church property located in any one of these provinces. Bear in mind, please, that Civil Governor Taft, in order to avoid public disturbance over this property, and being unwilling to assume the grave responsibility of determining so important and far-reaching a question, took the wise, just, and humane course of referring it to the courts, and the Philippine government then proceeded to designate the supreme court of the islands as the tribunal to try the question, conferring upon it original jurisdiction for that purpose, and providing all the legal machinery requisite to its speedy and final determination.

Some of those here will doubtless be surprised to be told that notwithstanding what has been said by gentlemen who have preceded me, notwithstanding the imperative and universally recognized necessity for a legal determination of the question of ownership of this vast church property, and notwithstanding the wise action of Civil Governor Taft and the subsequent enactment of a special act conferring original jurisdiction upon the supreme court of the islands to hear and determine these church controversies, no action has ever been brought up to this time having that object in view. It is true that some sort of an action was brought in January, 1904, in an inferior court in the province of Ambos Camarines, to recover the possession of a small church and convento located in the pueblo of Lagonoy. This case, brought a year and a half prior to the enactment of the statute to which I have alluded, was carried on appeal to the supreme court. This is the case of Barlin v. Ramirez, relied upon by the advocates of this report to sustain their contention that the question as to the ownership and title of all the church properties in the Philippines has been decided in favor of the Roman Catholic Church, and that it is, therefore, entitled to receive whatever sum may be paid for damages thereto as well as for the use thereof.

As I have said this section was brought for the purpose of determining the right to the possession, and not the actual ownership and title to this property. My friend, the chairman of this committee, says that the complaint in this case sets forth that the plaintiff was the owner of the property, and that is true; but this bare statement in the opinion handed down by the supreme court is all that can be found in that opinion which supports the contention that anything beyond the mere right of possession was in issue. The prayer of the complaint, we are told, was that the plaintiff be restored to the possession of the property, and throughout the opinion it is made clear that bare possession, and only possession, was the question involved. Mr. Chairman, I dare affirm that there is not a lawyer in this body who, if he will take the trouble to read carefully this rather remarkable opinion, will say that any question of title was involved in this case. On this point the court said:

> As to the defendant, Ramirez, it appears that he took possession of the property as the servant or agent of the plaintiff. The only right which he had to the possession at the time he took it was the right which was given to him by the plaintiff, and he took possession under the agreement to return that possession whenever it should be demanded of him. Under such circumstances he will not be allowed, when the return of such possession is demanded of him by the plaintiff, to say that the plaintiff is not the owner of the property and is not entitled to have it delivered back to him. The principle of law that a tenant can not deny his landlord's title, which is found in article 333, paragraph 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and also in the Spanish law, is applicable to a case of this kind.

And again:

The plaintiff, in 1902, had been in the lawful possession thereof for more than thirty years and during all that time its possession had never been questioned or disturbed. That possession has been taken away from it and it has the right now to recover the possession from the persons who have so deprived it of such possession, unless the latter can show that they have a better right thereto. This was the proposition which was discussed and settled in the case of the Bishop of Cebu v. Mangaron, No. 1748, decided June 1, 1906. That decision holds that as against one who has been in possession for the length of time the plaintiff has been in possession, and who has been deprived of his possession, and who can not produce any written evidence of title, the mere fact that the defendant is in possession does not entitle the defendant to retain that possession. In order that he may continue in possession, he must show a better right thereto.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What is the title of that case? Is that the Barlin case?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes; I am reading from the Barlin case.

These are the words of Judge Willard, who delivered the opinion of the court, and to my mind they conclusively establish, without any reference to what is said on this subject in the independent opinion of Judge Carson, that the only question before the court was the question of possession. No copy of the record in this case has ever been received here, so far as I know, and we can only gather what the facts were from reading the two opinions which have been furnished us.

It is true that Judge Willard declares, in the concluding part of his opinion, that the King of Spain was not the owner of the consecrated churches in the Philippines, and that the exclusive right to their possession was in the Roman Catholic Church; but this, at most, was merely obiter dictum. No such question as that was raised in the pleadings, and, moreover, neither Spain nor the United States as her successor under the treaty of Paris was a party to this suit.

Mr. COCKRAN. As I understand the gentleman, this priest had been in the possession of this church property, and the issue there was the right of possession and not the actual possession?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The issue was the right of possession, the right to recover the actual possession.

Mr. COCKRAN. Did not that involve the title?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Not the ownership; there is a vast difference between the two propositions, as my friend knows.

Mr. COCKRAN. Yes; but I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. What other question was litigated in order to establish the right of possession except the question of title, if any?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The question of title was not litigated at all. The case was decided upon a principle familiar to every lawyer, namely, that a tenant is estopped from denying the title of his landlord. The defendant priest had been put in possession of this church by the Roman Catholic Church, and when he refused to surrender possession thus conferred upon him by that church suit was brought in the court of first instance of the province to compel him to restore the possession thus unlawfully withheld. He was not permitted to even deny the title of his landlord.

This case having been carried to the supreme court, the only question properly before that appellate tribunal was the question of possession. Every single word, every single expression, in the opinion delivered by the supreme court dealing with questions not properly before that tribunal, as every lawyer knows, is nothing more nor less than pure obiter dictum, and, in so far as that opinion undertakes to decide anything except the right of possession of this property, it is absolutely ultra vires.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to know if the gentleman stated what the claim of the plaintiff, if that is his title—the party bringing the suit—what the claim was based on as against the possessory title of the defendant in this case? I understand that a possessory title is as good as another title if it has been long enough established.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. In the absence of any copy of the record in this case, it is not easy to determine from the opinion of the court just what the facts were. They were certainly very meager. It is stated that the form of action was a complaint, and that is all. Just what was set out therein does not appear. It does appear, however, from a careful reading of the two opinions filed that the right to the possession of the church was the only issue properly involved.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it not fair to infer that they had a superior title to the defendant, or that the apostolic church had granted them the right?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I can only speak as to what was claimed from the record before me. It may be, and I presume is, true that the Roman Catholic Church claims the ownership of all the church properties in the islands, and I am not undertaking to express any opinion on that subject. I am only contending that no such claim has as yet been set up and judicially determined.

The point I make is that this was a suit brought in the early part of the year 1904, in an inferior court, to determine the possession, and not the title and ownership, of the Lagonoy church.

I further contend, even if I can be mistaken in believing that no question of title was involved in this litigation, that a decision which affected only this particular piece of church property could not determine the title of all the vast church properties scattered throughout the Philippine Archipelago, the magnificent cathedral at Manila, and the hundreds of churches, conventos, and seminaries in the various provinces. To hold to the contrary is to maintain what to my mind is bordering on the absurd. To dignify this paltry case, the very issues of which it must be at least admitted by the most strenuous advocates of this report are enveloped in doubt and uncertainty, as an all-important test case and one deciding the ownership of vast property interests and settling great questions of canon law seems to me to be absolutely preposterous.

Mr. KEIFER. Will you read the decision?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The decision or the sylabus?

Mr. KEIFER. The syllabus.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The syllabus of the case, which I have been asked to read, is as follows:

1. In an action brought by the Roman Catholic Church to recover a church building against a priest whom it has put in possession thereof to administer the same, the latter is estopped from alleging ownership at the time he took possession, either in himself or in a third person.
2. Obispo de Cebu v. Mangaron, No. 1748, June 1, 1906, followed to the point that a person in possession of real estate who has been deprived of such possession can recover it unless the defendants can show a better right thereto.
3. The government of the Philippine Islands has never undertaken to transfer to the municipalities the ownership or right of possession of the churches therein.
4. Prior to the cession of the Philippines to the United States the King of Spain was not the owner of the consecrated churches therein and had no right to the possession thereof. The exclusive right to such possession was in the Roman Catholic Church, and such right has continued since such cession and now exists.
5. The Roman Catholic Church is a juridical person in the Philippine Islands.

What is said by Judge Willard, to the effect that neither Spain nor the United States owned the church property in the Philippines, was not at all necessary to the proper disposition of the case, and, as I have said, was mere obiter dictum. That question was not before the court, and if it had been the United States, as the successor to Spain, not being a party to the litigation, would not have been bound by any deliverance in relation thereto.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would like to ask the gentleman this question——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I shall be glad to have the gentleman ask a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does not the gentleman know two-thirds of this entire opinion is taken up by the supreme court in discussing and deciding the question of title, and the court decided that the title to the property was not in Spain nor the United States nor the Independent Church, nor any property situated as this was in the entire archipelago, and that it involved every principle that applies to the controversy between churches over there——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Please do not make a speech; I yielded for a question. I will answer the gentleman. I am entirely aware that a large part of the opinion delivered by Judge Willard is devoted to an attempt to show that neither Spain nor the United States owned the church property in the Philippines; but no such question as that was or could have been involved, for the simple reason that neither the Kingdom of Spain nor the United States was a party to the suit. Moreover, as I think I have shown, no question of title was involved in this suit. The court could not determine questions not before it.

I freely admit that Judge Willard's opinion was a long-drawn-out and labored attempt to decide a question of vast importance not before him, a question which he may have thought the political exigencies of the situation as to church property made it most desirable that the court should decide, but I utterly deny that it did or could have decided this question.

Now, permit me to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] that I shall be glad to have him explain, when he comes to address the House, why it was that the Philippine government in July 1905, passed a special act providing the means for determining the ownership of all church properties in the Philippines, if that question was at that very moment pending before the supreme court on an appeal from a court of first instance. If this momentous question had been passed upon by an inferior court and was then before the supreme court, why did the Philippine government pass a special act conferring jurisdiction upon that court—original jurisdiction—to hear and determine it? Was it possible that the governor of the Philippines—himself a member of the Philippine Commission—could have been in ignorance of this important decision? The truth is, and gentlemen know it, that nobody regarded this as a test case. To maintain otherwise is to seriously reflect upon the intelligence of the Philippine Commission and to hold that the Philippine government in passing this act stultified itself.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman knows that——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The gentleman can answer in his own time. Ask me a question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me ask the gentleman if he does not know this decision of the supreme court governing the Philippine Islands was not rendered until more than a year after that act; that the decision was rendered more than a year after the special act to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. OLMSTED. November 24, 1906.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does not the gentleman furthermore know——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will answer that——

Mr. DRISCOLL. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let the gentleman answer the question; I would like to have him answer my question.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The case was not passed upon until the latter part of 1906, but it was decided in the court of first instance in January, 1904, and it was pending before the supreme court in July, 1905, at the very moment the act was passed. Surely the Philippine government was not unaware that a case of this great magnitude was already pending when it passed this act.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What were the issues?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The only issue was that of the right of possession—that was the sole issue. Just why the supreme court took nearly three years in which to consider its opinion in this case is not disclosed by the opinion. I might assign a reason if I cared to discuss that phase of this remarkable case. I prefer not to discuss its political aspects.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I do.

Mr. WASHBURN. May I ask the gentleman a question? I would like to ask if the gentleman is familiar with the case in which the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church is plaintiff and certain municipalities and Aglipay himself, as head of the Independent Church, are defendants, the original action in the supreme court?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I have it here in my hand.

Mr. WASHBURN. The gentleman is going to comment on that case.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I am going to comment on that case later on. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL].

Mr. DRISCOLL. Am I correct in my understanding of the gentleman from Virginia that he has never seen the bill of complaint in this case that was brought and tried over there, in which Justice Willard rendered a decision?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. You are, and I think nobody else in the United States has ever seen it.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Then the gentleman does not know what facts or allegations are contained in that bill of complaint in that action?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Only in so far as they are stated by the judge who delivered the supreme court opinion, and who sought by the labored argument to which I have referred to settle the title to church property in the islands.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The gentleman admits that about two-thirds of the opinion of Judge Willard was given up to the consideration and determination of the question of title. Is that not so?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. A large part of it. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] says two-thirds.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Since the gentleman has not read the complaint, and since two-thirds of the opinion were given up to the determination of title, why does the gentleman say that the question of title was not raised in the complaint?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I say it because a careful reading of the text of this opinion makes it absolutely clear to my mind that nothing more than the mere possession was involved. I have already stated that whilst the complaint is said to have alleged ownership in the plaintiff, its prayer was for the recovery of the possession. Besides, Judge Carson, who concurred in the result, explicitly states in his independent opinion that there was no question of title involved. There is nothing in Judge Willard's opinion in conflict with this statement; on the contrary, that opinion strengthens my contention.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I understood the gentleman to say that it considered the right to possession and not simply the question of possession.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I have read the syllabus in the case——

Mr. DRISCOLL. Since the gentleman has——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I request the gentleman not to make a speech in my time. I am very anxious to present my reasons for declining to concur in this report.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. If the gentleman will wait for half an hour in order to enable me to present my views without interruption, I will then endeavor to answer any further questions that may be asked me. I wish Members of this House to understand exactly what the issue is, and I am utterly surprised that some of my colleagues upon the committee seem prepared to contend that the case of Barlin v. Ramirez settles the ownership and title of all the church property in the islands.

In enacting the legislation which conferred upon the supreme court the jurisdiction to determine the question of the ownership of all church properties the Philippine Commission not only made it perfectly plain that it did not regard the case of Barlin v. Ramirez as settling anything but the right to the possession of the particular church which was the subject of that litigation, but it also made it clear that the Philippine government did not believe that the determination of any one case could settle the ownership of all the properties wherever located. This is shown by the fact that it prescribed the method by which the title to all the church property in any one province might be determined in a simple suit, brought originally in the supreme court at Manila. Let me read the preamble to that act and let us see if it does not sustain my contention. Here it is. Mark you, this was in July, 1905, a year and a half after the decision of the case of Barlin v. Ramirez in the court of first instance and whilst it was pending on appeal before the supreme court. It reads:

Whereas controversies have arisen between the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church on the one hand and the association called "the Independent Filipino Church," certain municipalities, and other persons on the other hand as to the right of administration or possession of numerous churches, convents, cemeteries, and real and personal property used in connection therewith, and as to the ownership thereof and title thereto; and

Whereas if actions involving controversies as to said church property are brought in the courts of first instance great and interminable delay, by reason of the great number of properties involved and the fact that the courts of first instance are fully occupied with ordinary litigation, will result not only in the disposition of the actions so brought, but also in the disposition of the ordinary litigation pending before said courts; and

Whereas frequent and angry controversies have arisen and continue to arise in numerous municipalities of the Philippine Islands between contending religious organizations, municipalities, and other persons as to the right to the possession of said properties, often culminating in illegal and forcible seizure thereof and in grave disturbances of the public peace and order, and it is believed to be in the interests of the Filipino people that such a condition of affairs should no longer continue and that all controversies of this character should be speedily settled in a legal and orderly way, etc.

In this preamble it is declared in plain terms that the controversies waged over the ownership and possession of church properties had not been settled. They had not been settled in the very case now relied upon to support the claims we are asked to pay the Roman Catholic Church. It was not believed that the final determination of that case by the supreme court could settle this great question, and hence this enactment.

This is the first section of the act passed to settle this important legal question and to compose these unfortunate differences:

SECTION 1. The supreme court of the Philippine Islands is hereby given original jurisdiction and constituted the tribunal to hear and finally determine all actions which involve controversies between the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church and its representatives on the one hand and the Independent Filipino Church and its representatives or any municipality or other person on the other hand as to the title to any and all churches, convents, or cemeteries in the Philippine Islands and real and personal property used in connection therewith, or as to the ownership, right of administration, or possession thereof.

That is a complete answer to the question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. The Philippine government in enacting this law seems to have considered that a distinction was to be drawn between a suit to determine "the right of possession" to a church and one to settle the question of "title and actual ownership."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Was that statute made retroactive so as to affect anybody's right who had begun a proceeding prior to that enactment?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I have already attempted to answer that question. But for the purpose of my argument, I might concede, although such is by no means the case, that in the case of Barlin v. Ramirez the plaintiff not only recovered possession of the property, but was also adjudged to be the actual owner thereof. If this were true, that case could not be held to settle that the Roman Catholic Church was entitled to the possession of any other church edifice than the one actually in controversy.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman misconceives my question, I think.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I think that everybody must admit, even the gentlemen who argue so strenuously for this report, that there is at least a doubt as to whether the title and ownership to the Lagonoy church was decided. You must admit that much. Admitting that——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not admit it.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Admitting that, are you going to seriously ask this House to accept it as a test case, and proceed to hold that as such it has finally and irrevocably settled the ownership and title of all the vast church properties in the Philippines? Surely this would be going further than the most zealous partisan would dare go.

Now, mark you, that was a case in which the defendant had been put in possession by the plaintiff, and the court held that he was estopped from denying his landlord's title. Are we to say by our action upon these claims, dare we say, that the facts as to the possession of every other church in the Philippines are indentical with those disclosed in the case of Barlin v. Ramirez? Taking the most extreme view of this case contended for by the advocates of this report, it only decides that the Roman Catholic Church is entitled to be paid for the use and occupation of the church of Lagonoy and the damages thereto, fixed by the board of church claims at $475.

Mr. FORNES. You made a statement that the amount of damages involved accrued prior to 1902?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. FORNES. Is that correct? You also make a statement that the Independent Church did not exist prior to 1902. That is a fact, is it not, according to the testimony?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Is that the question?

Mr. FORNES. I am not a lawyer, but I am on the jury. How can you take into consideration either a corporation or a person that does not exist at the time the action has accrued? Will you answer that as a lawyer? [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will answer your question in this way: It is not the first time it has been propounded. If the Roman Catholic Church can be shown to have been entitled to the possession of these churches during the period they were occupied by United States troops, then that church would be entitled to receive compensation for such occupancy. But any payment for damage to or destruction of church property should, of course, be paid to the owner without any regard to who was entitled for the time being to the mere possession.

Now, this is my answer to that question, and I beg that gentlemen who do not agree with me will at least restrain their eagerness to interrupt the thread of my argument until I have proceeded with it a little further. I shall probably be the only one to speak at any length in favor of the views set forth in the report submitted by the minority. I have been asked if the passage of the act of July, 1905, took from the courts of first instance jurisdiction theretofore exercised by them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. "Was it retroactive?" was my question.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It does take away their jurisdiction to try questions of title. As to whether it was retroactive or not I am not so clear. In my view of this matter that is not a question of any great importance. The claim which we are now asked to pay relates to the occupancy of four hundred and odd churches, and even if the act of July, 1905, did not take away the jurisdiction of the supreme court to try the case of Barlin v. Ramirez on appeal (that case having been appealed prior to its enactment), the decision rendered in that case can only affect the property actually in litigation. This was evidently the view taken by the Philippine government. It is perfectly clear to me that no question of title was in any way involved in that case, so that the question as to whether or not the act of July 24, 1905, was retroactive is of no importance.

But, Mr. Chairman, whatever view may be taken by the House as to this legal question, I submit that there can be no justification for increasing the award of the board of church claims to the extent of $40,000. The chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, who was directed by the committee to report this bill, said a few moments ago that he had not favored the payment of this $40,000. Upon what principle of law or justice anybody can favor its payment passes my comprehension. The military board of church claims awarded $363,000 in round numbers. In reaching their conclusions as to the amount for which the United States was justly liable, they had the benefit of the advice and assistance of the Army officers who occupied the church buildings and who personally investigated the injuries inflicted upon them by United States troops. It was not possible in the limited time at their disposal for the individual members of the board to make personal investigations in a majority of the cases. Acting under the explicit written instructions of the Secretary of War as to the character of the injuries for which the United States could be held liable, this board awarded $363,030.19 as the total amount. This was a larger sum than the officers who had occupied the property, and who possessed personal knowledge as to the injuries, believed should be paid. To the amount ascertained to be due by these Army officers, the board added from 12 to 15 per cent, so as to be certain that they would do full justice to the claimants. Under these circumstances, what possible justification can there be for the payment of $403,030.19?

I am betraying no committee secrets when I say that the members of the Insular Affairs Committee who signed the views of the minority are not the only ones who do not believe a particle of justification can be found for arbitrarily adding the sum of $40,000 to the award of the board of church claims. The chairman of the committee has been frank enough to avow here, and openly, that he did not favor adding this sum to the award, and he is not the only member of the majority who did not favor it in committee. It is a gratuity pure and simple—a sop thrown to Cerberus. The pretext for its payment is that there had disappeared from the churches at some time or other certain sacred ornaments, images, and vestments, but there is absolutely no evidence to show that these articles were taken or appropriated by any representatives of the United States, if they were actually taken by anybody.

The bill we are considering also provides that this $403,030.19 shall be paid to the Archbishop of Manila. The Archbishop of Manila, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] as well as every other Catholic in this House knows, does not hold the title to the church property in the various dioceses of the Philippine Islands. The gentleman admits this. The bishops of the five dioceses hold the church property. The gentleman now says this is true. Nevertheless, this bill provides, and the report recommends, that this money be paid to the Archbishop of Manila.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has not stated all of it, has he?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. All that is of any importance.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman has not made a complete statement. It is to be paid to the Archbishop of Manila as trustee. Will the gentleman go on and state what the bill provides?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. If I can put my hand on it I will read its exact provisions. It is to be paid to him as trustee for the Roman Catholic Church, of course.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bill provides that it shall be paid to him as trustee for certain specific purposes.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It shall be paid to him as the representative of the church in the islands. I am coming to that.

Mr. COCKRAN. Is the gentleman not aware that all the bishops have agreed to make Archbishop Harty the depositary of this money?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That may be, but it can not be denied, I think, that the archbishop can collect this money as soon as the act of Congress becomes a law, and that he can expend every dollar of it according to his own sweet will for the benefit of the Catholic Church anywhere without regard to the wishes of either one of these bishops, in whom the title to the property must be if the church owns it.

It was said at the hearings, and the printed testimony will show it—the Secretary of War and Colonel Hull both said that in order to obtain for the United States a clear acquittance it would be necessary to have the bishops of the various dioceses join in any receipt which might be given. What assurance have we that either of these bishops will execute an acquittance? How do we know that if this large sum of money is paid to the archbishop of Manila it may not be spent in the United States, or, for that matter, in Spain or in Italy? Permit me to call the attention of the House to this bit of testimony bearing upon this very point. I commend it to the gentlemen who may wish to vote according to the lights before them.

When Secretary Taft was before the Insular Affairs Committee I asked him this question:

Mr. Secretary, would there be any objection to limiting the expenditure of this money to objects in the islands?

Now, mark the question, "limiting the expenditure of this money to objects in the islands.' Bear in mind, too, that every church in the islands was built on Government property, and built out of funds contributed by, and labor furnished by, the inhabitants of the islands. Secretary Taft's reply was——

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. If the gentleman will wait just a minute. The gentleman from New York is trying to get in between a question and an answer. I will read the question again:

Mr. JONES. Mr. Secretary, would there be any objection to limiting the expenditure of this money to objects in the islands?

Secretary TAFT. No, sir. I wish, certainly, that would be the case.

If, may I ask, the purpose be to expend this money in repairing and in rebuilding the churches injured and destroyed by American troops in the Philippines, why do gentlemen object to its being paid to the bishops of the dioceses where the property is, or was, located, and why do they object to a requirement that it shall be expended within the islands? Secretary Taft thought such a limitation as this should be placed upon the payment, and his interest in the welfare of the Filipinos is conceded by everybody.

At another time I asked him another question along this line, and I will also read that question and the Secretary's answer:

Mr. JONES. I should fear if it were paid to the apostolic delegate it might be used outside of the islands—in Spain, for instance.

Secretary TAFT. If there were any danger of that, I should like some limitation made to prevent it.

So far as I know there has been no reason advanced by anybody why this money should be paid to the Archbishop of Manila rather than to the bishops of the dioceses by whom the title to all church property is held, or why some limitation as to how and where it shall be expended should not be placed upon it.

Mr. LENAHAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LENAHAN. Did anyone suggest that the money was to be diverted from the Philippine Islands except the gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The subject was discussed by various members of the committee. But whether or not anybody else suggested that in the absence of some limitation the money could be expended outside the islands I do not know nor do I care. [Applause.] I made such a suggestion, and it was graciously received and accepted by the Secretary of War, who feels a deeper interest in the settlement of these church claims than anybody else known to me.

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. For a question.

Mr. FORNES. The gentleman is aware that the archbishop is superior to the bishops and that the bishops have agreed and are most anxious that the archbishop should receive it. The gentleman is furthermore aware——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I can not allow the gentleman to make a speech in my time in order that he may tell me of what he says I am aware. [Laughter.] I admit that there was some loose talk before the committee to the effect that the bishops desired that the money should be paid to the archbishop. There was like loose talk before the committee to the effect that the apostolic delegate, who is the special representative of the Pope in the islands, would be a proper person to whom to pay it. Nobody, however, who testified before our committee pretended to speak for the bishops. I am content to know that Secretary Taft expressed the wish that the bill should require the expenditure of this money upon objects in the islands, and one of the most vital objections to it is that it does not do so.

I have said that there could be no justification for arbitrarily adding $40,000 to the amount found to be due by the board of church claims. At first the proposition was to add a large sum by way of interest, but when attention was called to the fact that Congress never allowed interest on claims of this character, and that to do so in this instance would be to establish a troublesome precedent and perhaps jeopardize the passage of the bill, that idea was abandoned. Finally somebody conceived the brilliant idea of paying for vestments and sacred ornaments, the spoilation of which was never proven.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Very well.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My understanding is that the Secretary of War said that $500,000 would be a reasonable amount.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. He said he would be glad to see even twice the amount found to be due by the board paid, and at another time he suggested $500,000. He always expressed the hope that Congress would be as liberal as possible in the settlement of these claims, but he always regarded, I think, anything that might be paid in excess of the $363,000 as a gift.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was it not stated before the committee upon what the Secretary based his estimate of $500,000?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The church claimed more than two million dollars, if I am not mistaken, and it was the idea of Secretary Taft that the committee should go as far as it could with propriety in meeting its demands. It was his opinion that whatever sum might be given would be wisely expended in the way of settling disturbing questions in the islands. Perhaps I might describe it as "peace money."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Just for a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Virginia please put his finger, as it were, on that part of the opinion which adjudicated that the title was in this church and the part which he says decides that it was a question purely of possession which the court decided. I would like to have the gentleman read those portions.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I can not undertake to read this long opinion.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, that particular part.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I have read the syllabus and certain parts of the opinion. I can not take up my time now by reading the whole opinion. I will give the case to the gentleman and direct his attention to those portions of the opinion which have been commented upon.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We are very anxious to get at those two points.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. In just one moment——

Mr. COCKRAN. As to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I want first to make it clear, if I can, just what the supreme court did decide, for the minds of gentlemen seem to be greatly confused as to this point. If gentlemen will examine the testimony given at the hearings they will find that even the Secretary of War, who is doubtless the best informed man in the United States as to conditions in the Philippine Islands, was himself mistaken even as to how this case came before the supreme court. When this claim was first brought to the attention of the Committee on Insular Affairs, in January, 1907, Secretary Taft appeared before that committee and advocated its payment. He said then that the supreme court of the Philippines had decided that the Roman Catholic Church owned all the church property in the islands. He had just received a cablegram giving him that information. He was asked by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] whether the case to which he referred went up to the court upon an appeal or whether it was a case brought originally in the supreme court under the act which I have cited, and the Secretary unhesitatingly said, and, of course, believed it when he said it, that it was a case brought originally in the supreme court and not one carried there upon appeal. He did not then dream, of course, that the case which he had been led to believe decided the title to all the immensely valuable church property in the Philippines had been brought in an inferior court for the purpose of regaining the possession of a single church in a remote province. I have his testimony before me and will read it if any gentleman desires it—both the question of Judge CRUMPACKER and the Secretary's answer. It turned out, as I have shown, that the Secretary was absolutely mistaken. No case had ever been brought in the supreme court to test the ownership of this church property. The case taken to that court on appeal did not even involve any question of title or ownership.

The defendant, Ramirez, did not and could not deny that he had been put in possession of the church by the bishop who sought to recover its possession. The court held that he was estopped from denying the title of his landlord and therefore ejected him. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] asks me where I got my information that the question involved in this case was merely one of possession. He wished to know if I get it from the record of the case of Barlin v. Ramirez. My answer is that I do. No lawyer can read this case and come to any other conclusion. Every line of the opinion makes this absolutely clear. Judge Carson, who concurred in the decision of the court, but who dissented from some of the statements and much of the reasoning of Judge Willard, who delivered the opinion, makes it absolutely clear that the only question properly involved in this case was the question of possession. It was because no question of title was before the court that Judge Carson felt constrained to write his separate views, and it was doubtless for the same reason that Judge Johnson declined to subscribe to the opinion of the majority of the court. He was present and withheld his vote and there could have been no other reason for his course. It can not be possible that I am mistaken as to the issue in this case, and I do not have to go outside the two opinions to make clear my contention.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the gentleman concede, then, that the court held the Catholic Church was this priest's landlord?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRAN. Did the court find how the church became his landlord? Could they have found it was his landlord except by first finding that it had title to the property?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. We are not left in doubt as to that——

Mr. COCKRAN. I want to know——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. We are not left in doubt as to that. The court explicitly declared that the defendant had been put in possession by the church. Just how or when he was put in possession I do not know, but he was put in possession. I may say, too, that when he was put in possession he was a priest of the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church, but that he subsequently, as I understand, and his whole congregation with him, went over to the Independent Filipino Catholic Church. His contention was that the title to the property was in the United States as the successor to the Spanish Government, but that it was held in trust for the benefit of the people who worshiped in the church, and that inasmuch as the priest and all the worshipers were members of the Independent Filipino Catholic Church they were entitled to occupy and use it for religious purposes. But the court held that having been put in possession by the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church he was estopped from denying the title of his landlord, and the case was decided upon that point. All of the judges agreed as to that proposition, but Judge Willard went so far as to declare in his opinion that the King of Spain had never really had any title to this church, and that therefore the United States, as the successor to the rights of the King of Spain, could have none—that in effect the title was in the Roman Catholic Church. This declaration, as every lawyer knows, was a mere obiter dictum, and in so far as it may have attempted to decide the title and ownership of property, the right to the possession of which alone was before the court, the decision was clearly ultra vires.

Mr. COCKRAN. There was no dispute about the fact of possession itself, was there? Was there any dispute about Ramirez being in actual possession?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. There was not. I have stated that Ramirez was put in possession by the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church. When the schism in the church came and he and his whole congregation went into the independent Filipino branch of the church, he attempted to retain the possession of the church property. A suit was brought in an inferior court of the province to oust him. It is preposterous to claim that anything more than the right of possession was or could have been decided in this case.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman allow me? I want to get his meaning perfectly clear.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I have stated it as clearly as I can. The gentleman will have to state his own fine-spun theories.

Mr. COCKRAN. I do not think there is much difference between the gentleman and myself, and I think this would be clear if I could get his position stated according to what I apprehend is the real significance of his language.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. If the gentleman will only ask a question——

Mr. COCKRAN. As I understand the case, it was admitted that this priest was in possession and he set up as a claim of right against the church which appointed him—against its right to take possession or exercise control over this church property—the fact that he and his congregation had seceded from the Roman Catholic Church and had gone over to Aglipay, and against this contention the court held that the right of the church was superior to his and that even the transfer by his whole congregation of their allegiance to this other body did not justify him in holding the property against the church that had placed him in possession of it.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I do not find that in the opinion.

Mr. COCKRAN. I understood that to be the gentleman's own statement.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. What the court said was that the defendant, having been put in possession of the property by the Roman Catholic Church, he was estopped by a principle of law familiar to every lawyer from denying the title of his landlord. That was all that was decided, and I have so stated over and over again. That was all that could have been decided; but Judge Willard, although he is presumed to have known when he wrote his opinion that the government of the Philippine Islands had conferred upon the supreme court original jurisdiction to try and determine all controversies over church property, undertook to decide in an insignificant case which came to his court by appeal the absolute ownership of all the church property in the Philippines, and that, too, a case which did not involve any question of title. The defendant never for one moment contended that the branch of the church to which he belonged had any actual title to this property. He made no such defense. I trust I may now have made it clear that the case of Barlin v. Ramirez, relied upon to sustain the contention that the courts have adjudged the Roman Catholic Church to be the absolute owner of all church properties in the Philippines, decides nothing of the kind. Therefore, for the reasons which I have set forth, it is worse than absurd to contend that this is a great test case.

And, now, a word as to the parties to this church conversy. It is purely a question between Catholics—between two branches of the same church. It is not a question between the Roman Catholic Church and any Protestant Church. The members of the Independent Filipino Catholic Church, who claim the right to worship in the Catholic churches of the Philippines, are as devout Catholics as can be found anywhere. They have never known any other religion than that of Catholicism.

There exists a schism——

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman? I understand from your speech you are advocating the claims of the bolting side, and I am for the regular organization. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, tradition has it that there was once a contested election case pending before this House, when a Member who had heard none of the evidence was called upon to vote as to which of the contestants should be seated. Without the slightest hesitation he turned to a colleague and asked, "Which is our d—— rascal?" [Laughter.] The gentleman may make the application.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it is right. I think your men got in possession and while in possession——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The gentleman can not discuss this subject in my time. He can get time from the other side, if he wishes it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am against the bushwhacker.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Well, I am only the custodian of my own conscience and only responsible for my own vote, I am happy to say. I am attempting to give the reasons for my own action and that of the three members of the Committee on Insular Affairs who united with me in filing the views of the minority.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I would like to be permitted to conclude what I was saying when interrupted by my friend from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON]—that there is a most serious schism in the Catholic Church in the Philippines—a schism that has rent the churches in twain is a matter of well-known history. Just how many Filipinos there are who belong to the branch known as the "Roman Catholic Church" and how many to the other branch, styled the "Independent Filipino Catholic Church," I do not know. In the opinion of the four Members signing the minority views there are about 3,000,000 Filipinos in the independent church.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will permit me one interruption. I have it from a person who has just returned from the islands, and who presumably knows, and he says that there are hardly to exceed 350,000 of these Independents.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will accept that statement for what it is worth. I do not know who the gentleman is or what may be his means of information, and therefore, for one, I seriously question the accuracy of his statement. I have gotten my information from sources which I have every reason to believe are entirely trustworthy, and never before have I heard anybody estimate the membership of the Independent Catholic Church as low as 350,000. Bishop Brent, who has been stationed for seven years in the Philippine Islands, is reported in the papers as having recently expressed the opinion that there were 4,000,000 members of the Independent Church. This distinguished divine, who has but recently visited this country, is certainly competent to speak on this subject. He possesses an intimate knowledge of every part of the Philippine Archipelago. A gentleman near me suggests that his testimony should not be accepted for the reason that he is a Protestant bishop. I decline to accept so unworthy a suggestion. The fact that he is a Protestant bishop does not, in my opinion, disqualify him as a witness.

Mr. FORNES. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. No; I can not be interrupted now. I wish to say, in further reply to the statement just made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], that I hold in my hand a book entitled "Our Philippine Problem," written in 1905 by Henry Parker Willis, Ph. D. Professor Willis spent some time in the Philippines, and I imagine that he is quite as well informed as to the membership of the Independent Filipino Catholic Church as is the nameless gentleman from whom the gentleman from Wisconsin obtained his information.

I now read from the book of Professor Willis:

> To state the precise extent of the following gained by the Iglesia Filipina would be difficult, if not impossible. Aglipay himself estimates the number of his followers at 4,000,000, but some enthusiastic partisans raise this figure to 5,000,000. More conservative estimates made by American observers place the number of Aglipayans at 3,000,000. Catholic authorities are inclined to underestimate the strength of the movement very considerably. They usually speak of the whole organization as artificial and temporary and place the number of people actually engaged in it far too low. The truth is that the movement has gained a very strong hold in many parts of the islands and has left other portions entirely untouched. This, of course, is due to the extreme shortness of the period during which active operations have been conducted by the Aglipayans, while, on the other hand, the newness of the movement makes it impossible to say how firm will be the allegiance of those who have already accepted membership in it.

This same author claims that there are at least 250 priests and 20 bishops in the Independent Catholic Church.

I talked some two years ago with a gentleman whom I believe the chairman of the Insular Affairs Committee himself will admit is—or was, at least, at one time—thoroughly well informed on this subject, a gentleman who spent years in the Philippine Islands in the capacity of private secretary to one of the Philippine Commissioners, who has written much on Philippine subjects, and who is widely accepted as an authority in regard to things Philippine, and it was his opinion at that time that the Independent Church had a membership of 3,000,000.

Now, I do not care whether they number two million or three million or five million. They largely outnumber the adherents of the other branch of the church, and they are natives. They are Catholics, as are the others. They believe in the same tenets and they have the same rites and ceremonies that the Roman Catholics have. And they are as much entitled to consideration at the hands of Congress as are any other Catholics in the Philippine Islands. The native Filipinos, practically all of whom profess the Catholic religion, with their labor, their taxes, and their private contributions built and equipped these churches, and shall we say to them by our action to-day that they shall have no further interest in them? They were built, every one of them, on land belonging to the Government, and not to the Roman Catholic Church, under the concordat entered into between the King of Spain and the Catholic Church by which that sovereign agreed to build and maintain them. They were built by the Government for the benefit of all, and not of a small part of the Catholic population of the islands. And so, when my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] undertakes to say that the legal title to these churches is in either branch of this church, he says what can not be substantiated by the facts. The legal title never was in the Catholic Church. The legal title was always in the King of Spain, and there are those who contend—and as to that I express no opinion—that it passed under the treaty of Paris to the United States, and that when the United States Government transferred all of its property rights in the Philippine Islands to the Philippine government it passed to the Philippine government. I do not even contend that the Philippine government should administer this trust, if there is one, for the benefit of all the Catholics in the islands. My contention is simply that we should not prejudice any rights which the members of the Independent Church may have by our action here to-day. If it be as clear as some gentlemen seem to think that the Roman Catholic Church is the real owner of all this valuable church property let that church establish its title in the court which has been designated as the tribunal to settle the question. Why, I ask, should it not do so?

Mr. LENAHAN. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. You may.

Mr. LENAHAN. I desire to ask the gentleman if Secretary Taft did not declare in 1905 that the title to this property was in the Roman Catholic Church?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. He stated that as his opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Virginia resumes, the Chair would like to remind him that he has used one hour and fifteen minutes of his time.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will use a few minutes more and then I will reserve the remainder of my time.

I believe it to be true that Secretary Taft has said more than once that in his opinion the Roman Catholic Church was the rightful owner of this property. Nevertheless, he earnestly desired that the question should be settled in the courts. He never for one moment undertook to settle it himself. He merely expressed his individual opinion. Moreover, when he appeared before the Insular Affairs Committee in January, 1907, he thought the whole subject had been judicially and finally determined. In that, as I have shown, he was greatly mistaken.

A word more as to the legal question and I will conclude. One of my colleagues asked me a moment ago if I had seen some late decisions of the supreme court bearing upon this question. When some time since I called the attention of Secretary Taft to the fact that the case of Barlin v. Ramirez had not been brought originally in the supreme court, as he supposed was the case, and that it did not, in my opinion, settle anything but the right of possession to one small church, he replied that he thought there were two recent cases in which the question of title had been passed upon by the supreme court and immediately requested that they be sent me for my examination. Learning that this bill would in all probability be considered to-day, and not having received the promised decisions, I called at the War Department this morning on my way here in order to procure them, if possible. I got them, but the only opportunity I have had to read them was on the car which brought me here. I was informed by Major McIntyre, of the Insular Affairs Bureau, however, who gave me the copies, and who had examined the cases, that much to his regret they did not undertake to dispose of the question of title and ownership, but only of that of the right of possession. From my hasty reading of the opinions I think this is absolutely true.

I came straight from the War Department here, and when I entered the Hall I found this bill under consideration. I can only regret that I did not receive these decisions in time to carefully examine them. They were promised me at least two weeks ago. As to what they actually decide I must therefore depend, to a very large degree, on Major McIntyre, for whose judgment I entertain a very high opinion. I am entirely satisfied that they settled nothing more than was settled in the case of Barlin v. Ramirez, which, up to this very moment, has been relied upon by the advocates of the payment of this large sum of money to the Roman Catholic Church. The fact that these decisions have not before been furnished the committee, and the further fact that the case of Barlin v. Ramirez has all along been relied upon, convinces me that they decide nothing beyond a question of mere possession.

I will read a paragraph from one of these decisions upon which my eye has just happened to fall.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I can not yield now.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. But the gentleman promised to yield to me.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me without my consent. I will yield to the gentleman in my own sweet time. I shall now read from the opinion delivered by Judge Willard, the same judge who wrote the opinion in Barlin v. Ramirez:

> The only questions to be considered therefore, relate to this property in the barrio of La Paz, in the municipality of Tarlac, and the only defendants interested therein are the defendant Gregorio Aglipay and the municipality of Tarlac.

This clearly indicates to my mind that this could not possibly be regarded as a test case. The issue seems to have been of precisely the same character as was that in Barlin v. Ramirez. I notice, too, that two of the four American judges declined to subscribe to this opinion. They say:

> We agree to the dispositive part of the foregoing decision which adjudges the right of possession in favor of the plaintiff, adopting in this case the reasoning of the concurring opinion in the case of Barlin v. Ramirez.

Evidently another case in which only the right of possession was passed upon.

If there had been anything in this decision which, by any possibility, could have been so construed as to sustain the contention of the advocates of the payment of these claims, it would have been read long before in this discussion. The slightest expression tending to uphold the position so earnestly contended for by gentlemen would have been eagerly seized upon. That they have not been read shows the futility of reading them.

Now, I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the so-called "independent church" was not known and was not chartered or organized at the time of the making of the award?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. No, sir; it is not a fact.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does not this evidence before the committee show that to be the fact, and does it not appear in the hearings?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The evidence most emphatically does not show that to be the fact, and it does not so appear in the hearings before the committee. Now, I hope I have answered the gentleman's question to his satisfaction, and if his vote was dependent upon my replies, he will, of course, vote with me. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. JONES of Virginia. But I do not want anything further said. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Virginia is against the whole proposition?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes; and I believe the gentleman from New York is in favor of the whole proposition. And if the committee had recommended the payment of $5,000,000 instead of $400,000 he would still have been in favor of it. I give the gentleman full credit for his enthusiasm in behalf of these claims. Now, Mr. Chairman, one word more. I deprecate the attempt to have matters of religion and politics enter into the consideration of, and perhaps determine, a question like this. If gentlemen are going to permit their church affiliation and political considerations to determine their action in so important a matter as this, then, of course, I have wasted a great deal of time in discussing the legal aspects of the proposition now before us. Still, I have felt it to be my duty to present the case as it appears to me.

I hold that the legal status of the Catholic Church property in the Philippines is precisely what it was when Secretary Taft, then Civil Governor Taft, issued his order protecting its possession and occupancy; that it is precisely what it was when the Philippine government designated the court and provided the legal machinery for a speedy and final adjudication as to its rightful ownership, and that until this question of ownership and title has been finally passed upon Congress should not pay the claims embraced in this bill. The need for the adjudication of the title to this vast property is no less imperative now than it was in January, 1903, and in July, 1905. But if gentlemen will insist upon passing this bill, then strike out of it the $40,000 intended to be, or, rather, alleged to be, compensation for sacred ornaments, the loss of which has never been established, and provide that the money shall be expended in the Philippines for religious purposes.

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. In just one moment. In what I have said concerning this bill I certainly can not be accused of having been actuated by prejudice. All who are directly interested in this subject are Catholics. There is no earthly reason why I should prefer one party to this controversy rather than another, not the slightest.

Two weeks ago, or thereabout, a bill was passed by this House carrying a number of church claims, known as the "omnibus claims bill," claims for the use and occupation of and injury to churches. When that bill was being read under the five-minute rule I offered an amendment providing for the payment of a small claim to the Catholic Church of Fredericksburg, Va., in my district, a claim which had been pending here for many years. It had long since been referred by Congress to the Court of Claims, and had by that tribunal been thoroughly investigated and finally adjudicated, and by it certified to Congress for payment.

Mr. OLMSTED. Did you investigate the title to the land?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. There was no such question to be investigated, and yet my amendment was strenuously objected to by gentlemen who are now using their utmost endeavors to pass this bill. There has never been, and there never can be, any question as to either the amount, the justice, or the legality of the claim of the Catholic Church of Fredericksburg, and yet I was forced to withdraw my amendment looking to its payment by this Congress. That little church is located within 60 miles of this Capitol building, and yet the great Government of the United States has declined for a third of a century to pay it the paltry sum of $500, which the Court of Claims has adjudged to be due to it. The churches for the use of which we are now asked to pay $403,000 are separated from this capital city by 10,000 miles of land and sea, and it never has been judicially determined that the church seeking this payment actually owns them. This is a beautiful illustration of that even-handed justice of which so much has been said here. Now, I will answer the gentleman from California.

Mr. McKINLAY of California. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia, Has the Aglipayan branch of the Roman Catholic Church of the Philippine Islands ever made any claim for any portion of this award to the American Government or the island government or to Congress?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I am very glad the gentleman asks me that question. The Aglipayan branch, or the Independent Catholic Church in the Philippines, has not set up any claim. The contention of the Independent Filipino Catholic Church is that this property is held, or should be held, by the Philippine government, as it was originally held by the Spanish Kingdom, in trust for the benefit of the Filipino Catholic people who worship in the churches. Archbishop Aglipay, as I understand it, is perfectly willing that where a priest of the Roman Catholic Church and his congregation are worshiping in a church that they shall continue to worship there, but he insists that in those localities where every communicant is a member of the Independent Church they shall be permitted to use the church edifices there located for purposes of religious worship. He insists that those who built such churches shall be permitted to worship God therein according to the forms and ceremonies of the Catholic Church to which they have ever been and are still devoted, and that these splendid churches shall not be abandoned to the habitation of owls and wild beasts.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. I yield so much as may be necessary to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who desires to ask for unanimous consent——

Mr. BONYNGE. Before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to ask a question in regard to what he last stated. I understood the gentleman to say the independent branch church property is now held by the United States Government the same as it was held by the Kingdom of Spain.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The United States Government has by act of Congress transferred everything that it got from Spain to the Philippine government and it is now held by the Philippine government.

Mr. BONYNGE. Has not the supreme court of the Philippine Islands determined that question and decided that neither the Kingdom of Spain nor the Philippine government has any title to this property?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. That is just the question to which I have been addressing myself for most of the time that I have occupied the attention of the House. I have been endeavoring to demonstrate that no such question has ever been before the supreme court, and that therefore no such question could by any possibility have been adjudicated by that tribunal.

Mr. BONYNGE. But in the case that is cited by the majority of the committee, the court did determine, did it not, that the Kingdom of Spain did not have title and that the Philippine government has not the title?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will say to my friend——

Mr. BONYNGE. It did decide that, did it not?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I say it did not, for the excellent reason that no such question was presented to the court in the pleadings. That question was not properly before the court, and two of the four American judges refused to concur in the opinion of the court because it discussed a question not before it. They did concur in the judgment of the court.

Mr. BONYNGE. But we have not the pleadings, and have no method of determining what the issues were except as we read the opinion. Now, taking the opinion without the complaint, does not the opinion decide that the Kingdom of Spain did not have the title and that the Philippine government has not the title?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. If the gentleman will take the trouble to carefully read that opinion, and he will then say to me that in his judgment the case of Barlin v. Ramirez finally disposed of any claim which the United States as the successor to Spain might have had to church property in the Philippines, I will abandon my contention. I have this much faith in his ability as a lawyer and his fairness as a man. The United States was not even a party to the suit.

Mr. BONYNGE. I never read this opinion until to-day, but, in a cursory reading of it, I conclude the court does decide that specific question; that the Kingdom of Spain has not the title and the Filipino government has not the title.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I laid down this proposition when I first arose and now repeat it, that there is not a lawyer in this body who would dare assert that as his deliberate opinion in a court of justice. I have never discussed the case with one who would do it, and I will now go so far as to declare that there are members of the Insular Affairs Committee on the gentleman's side of the House, one of them into whose face I am now looking, who have frankly admitted to me that the position taken by me as to what this case does and does not decide is absolutely unassailable. One of the Members on your side of the House who will vote for this bill has, nevertheless, assured me that he is even more convinced than I am that my contention as to what this case decides is absolutely unanswerable.

I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a letter addressed to the Hon. Charles J. Bonaparte, Attorney-General, by Mr. Herman Ridder, president of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and editor and proprietor of the Staats-Zeitung. It gives the facts upon which a prosecution of the paper trust can be based. I do not want to take up the time of the committee, and I therefore ask consent to publish it as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that his remarks be extended in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION,
March 4, 1908.

DEAR SIR: I take pleasure in sending to you a copy of letter to the Attorney-General. It summarizes the publishers' statement of the efforts made by the seven groups of the American Paper and Pulp Association to stifle competition, to increase prices, and to put an additional burden of $60,000,000 per annum upon the printing and publishing interests of the country, without other justification than the power of combination.

Yours, faithfully,

HERMAN RIDDER,
President American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION,
February 10, 1908.

Hon. CHARLES J. BONAPARTE,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In the matter of combination of paper makers in restraint of trade, I venture, as president of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association to reply to your letter of November 13, 1907, addressed to Mr. John Norris. In that letter you say:

"If you are in possession of any further evidence tending to establish the fact that there exists an agreement or understanding among such manufacturers to maintain or increase the prices of paper to the consumer I shall be pleased to receive it; and should such additional evidence be sufficient to establish a case of an illegal combination or conspiracy I shall direct at once that proceeding be instituted with a view to obtaining immediate relief."

Appreciating the obligation that rests upon you to require evidence that shall be more than inference, I beg to call your attention to the following:

THE FIBER AND MANILA POOL.

I inclose (Exhibit 1 [a]) records of one organization of twenty-four paper mills (the Fiber and Manila Association), including ten mills, with capacity for news print paper. These records show that a pool was formed under the chairmanship of one John H. Parks, of No. 1 West Thirty-fourth street. The eight meetings of which we have reports show:

Creation of a ways and means committee.

Agreement on schedules of prices and discounts, with uniform trade customs respecting terms and charges for finishing, preparation, and packing. (See Exhibits 1 A and B [a] for schedules.)

Agreement upon a code establishing the percentages of sulphite pulp in each grade of paper.

The filing with the originator of the so-called "Parks pool plan" of all orders and names of customers and quotations of invoices and samples of paper and date of shipment.

The division of the product into "preamble" and "nonpreamble" goods.

Allotments of output by each of twenty-four mills.

Restriction of production.

Regulation of the basis of weights of paper.

Agreement to fix prices.

Agreement to advance prices.

Actual advances that ultimately reached $12 per ton.

Discriminations in prices upon shipments west of Minneapolis and north of Omaha.

Payments into a pool of part of the proceeds of all sales. (Usually the pool tax was $5 per ton sold.)

Divisions of 70 per cent of proceeds of the pool.

Allowances to mills that shut down.

Imposition of a penalty for shipments in excess of allotments.

Denial of quotations to six brokers. (Exhibit 1, p. 25.[a])

Restriction of jobbing to a special class and fixing the commission therefor.

Restriction of contract periods to three months, subject to permission of ways and means committee for a longer period.

Payments of money for expenses of pool and of those who had organized the association.

Creation of an exemption list with corresponding reductions in the participation of profits.

[a] Not printed.

Votes by mail on numerous questions, including the following:

"Should the association sell bag paper to jobbers or to bag manufacturers exclusively.

"Granting special privilege to a number to sell on terms better than thirty days."

Participation in the organization by members of the General Paper Company, who had been prohibited by Federal court from participating in such combinations.

Negotiations with "western trustee" mills and cooperation by them in the programme of the association and subsequent withdrawal of the "western trustee" mills.

Curtailment of profits of mills of one company to 50 per cent.

Instructions to counsel to find a plan for conducting the affairs of the association in such manner as would defeat any attack made upon it by the Federal or State government.

The association also voted upon the question of granting permission to members to bid on a large prospective contract in competition with a mill outside of the association.

DATES OF POOL MEETINGS.

Meetings of this particular association, of which we have reports, were held in New York City, either at the Waldorf-Astoria or at the offices of J. H. Parks, across the street, on the following dates:

November 14, 15, and 16, 1906.
December 13, 14, 15, 1906.
January 18, 19, 21, 22, 1907.
February 25, 26, 1907.
May 27, 28, 1907.
August 20, 1907.
September 19, 1907.
November 21, 1907.

At the meeting in February an advance of $3 per ton was ordered.

In May $3 per ton additional advance was ordered, with a rerating of mills.

In August $4 per ton advance was ordered by the eastern and western mills.

In November a shut down of one week was ordered, to restrict production.

At the meeting in November the following authorized statement was issued:

"At a largely attended meeting of wrapping-paper manufacturers it was the opinion of every manufacturer present that on account of the difficulty in getting cash to meet the pay roll, due to the financial stringency, and on account of the shortage of pulp wood, it was wisdom to shut down paper machines for at least a week. In order to give stability to the market it was also deemed advisable not to increase or decrease prices, but to hold them as at present."

The western fiber and manila paper manufacturers held a meeting in Chicago in the third week of December, 1907, at the Grand Pacific Hotel, at which the mills in Wisconsin and Michigan making these classes of paper were represented. A shut down of thirty days to starve the market was agreed upon, and the maintenance of pool prices was approved.

BOX BOARDS.

The box-board makers met in New York in the first week of June, 1907, and advanced the price $2 per ton, effective June 11, 1907, upon everything except patent white-coated board. This division of the American Paper and Pulp Association also planned a raid on the raw-material men to force down their prices.

In the first week of September, 1907, the box-board makers met at the office of J. H. Parks, No. 1 West Thirty-fourth street, New York, to act upon prices and to rerate mills.

MONEY IN KNICKERBOCKER TRUST CRASH.

May I call special attention to a statement published in the Paper Trade Journal of October 31, 1907, giving a report of the locking up of half a million dollars of the funds of this Parks pool in the Knickerbocker Trust Company? This fund purports to represent several months' profit of all the mills, as well as a two-year accumulation of a contingent fund. The attitude of the Government toward such a fund is a matter which I am sure you will promptly determine.

BOOK PAPER.

The book-paper makers, members of the American Paper and Pulp Association, combined in November, 1906, and adopted so-called "trade customs," fixing terms of sale, the minimum basis of weight, and extra prices for lighter weights, for finishing, and for trimming and wrapping. Subsequently, after conference with the jobbers' association, these regulations were slightly changed. In the modified form they were submitted and formally approved by the American Paper and Pulp Association at its meeting in New York in the second week of February, 1907. From time to time, on dates of which we have not at present the precise record, advances were made in the price of book papers by the combination of book-paper makers.

On April 1, 1907, this book-paper combination made an additional advance of $2 per ton in prices. New clauses were added to the "trade customs" regulations.

At Atlantic City on May 24, 1907, the book-paper manufacturers met to act in combination upon the price of book papers.

On September 30, 1907, they met in New York City and advanced the prices of eastern mills $3 per ton and of western mills $5 per ton. The old custom of sending out trade notices and of giving the new price list was abolished. A new method was adopted. Customers were notified that old prices had been withdrawn and new prices would be quoted on application.

At meetings held in New York, November 20, 21, and 22, 1907, an agreement to restrict production was acted upon. A further agreement to the same effect was made for the holiday week at the end of 1907.

WRITING PAPER.

On January 26, 1907, the writing-paper manufacturers, in accordance with an agreement made among themselves in combination, withdrew previous quotations and issued a new price list averaging $2 per ton increase. They also adopted trade customs regulations fixing prices on special sizes of papers and on special colors and on special orders of papers and for special weights of papers and for folding. These regulations were formally ratified by the American Paper and Pulp Association at its meeting in New York in February, 1907. (See p. 422, Paper Mill Directory.)

From time to time the makers of writing paper have met in New York to fix prices. The meeting on the third Friday of September, 1907, was held at Hotel Astor. A restriction of production over the holidays at the end of 1907 was also agreed upon by the writing-paper makers.

BLOTTING PAPER.

The blotting-paper makers, members of the American Paper and Pulp Association, advanced their prices $5 per ton in the last week of February, 1907, as the result of an agreement by a combination, this advance following a similar advance of $5 per ton, making a total of $10 per ton within a short period.

TISSUES.

The makers of No. 2 white and manila tissues met at the Fifth Avenue Hotel in the last week of March, 1907, to stop price cutting. The Crystal Paper Company, of Middletown, Ohio, has recently withdrawn from that association and has revised its price list to cut under that of the association.

SODA PULP.

The soda-pulp makers in the second week of October, 1907, at a meeting in New York, agreed upon a combination price for the year 1908.

On November 21, 22, and 23, 1907, the soda-pulp makers met in New York City to discuss a shut down in order that the artificial scarcity which they had produced might be maintained. At that meeting they decided not to reduce the price previously agreed upon.

SULPHITE PULP.

The sulphite-pulp makers met in New York November 20 and 21, 1907, to dissolve the old combination and to form a new one which would dodge the antitrust law. The shutting down of mills to continue the paper famine and maintain old prices was also planned at that meeting.

On December 19, 1907, the sulphite-pulp makers adopted new by-laws to carry out in new guise the purposes of price fixing and output restriction and trade conditions while evading the Federal statute. The new by-laws and the list of new officers are attached hereto, marked "Exhibit 4." [a]

A restriction of production over the holidays was also planned at the last meeting in December, 1907.

The sulphite-pulp makers, in anticipation of Federal inquiry, have changed the form of their organization, which has held monthly meetings in this city for more than a year. (See Exhibit 2, giving rules of the new association.[a])

We furnish herewith (Exhibit 4) a list of sulphite-pulp manufacturers, including Canadians, who attended a meeting at the Hotel Belmont, November 20, 1907, for promoting the purposes of the sulphite combination in restraint of trade.

NEWS PRINT.

We herewith furnish your Department a list of news print paper manufacturers who met in New York City early in September, 1907, to advance prices and who did so advance them, as follows:

For 1,000-ton orders in rolls, 2½ cents.
For less than 1,000-ton orders in rolls, 2.60 cents.
For less than 1,000-ton orders in sheets, 2.85 cents.

A prior advance had been made in the first week in March, 1907, and a meeting of eastern and western manufacturers was held in Chicago, March 11, 1907, to act upon another advance in price. (See Exhibit 3.[a])

SEVEN GROUPS OF PAPER MAKERS.

Seven groups of paper makers have held meetings in New York City within the last fortnight. These groups include pulp makers, makers of boards, tissue, book paper, news print paper, writing, and manila and wrapping paper. Sulphite pulp constitutes one-fifth of the material that enters into print paper, ground wood constituting four-fifths.

AMERICAN PAPER AND PULP ASSOCIATION.

All of the groups referred to have a common purpose and a common method, which is illustrated by the details herewith shown. All of these are subdivisions of the American Paper and Pulp Association, a national organization that has its headquarters and address at 309 Broadway, New York City. From a merely statistical body, with a restricted purpose of discussion and interchange of ideas, it has become a center for seven divisions of paper makers who have undertaken to cooperate through it in a general restriction of production, a regulation of the output, and an advance in prices through combinations so solidly organized as to control the market arbitrarily by pool agreements and penalties and restrictions.

The paper-making business is so interdependent between these groups that the actions of many of them have contributed materially toward producing an artificial scarcity in news print paper and an abnormal and utterly unjustifiable increase in the price of news print and book and other papers.

Half the members of the Fiber and Manila Association are rated also as producers of news print paper.

IGNORING PROHIBITION OF FEDERAL COURT.

We call your attention to the general shut down recently decided upon by many of these groups to curtail the supply and to maintain the artificial scarcity by which consumers of paper have been oppressed. (See Exhibit 5.[a])

We call your attention to the action of the twenty-four mills which formerly constituted the General Paper Company and which, after dissolution by the Federal court at the instance of your Department, and after service upon them of order of prohibition of further participation in combinations, have employed a common traffic manager to regulate shipments for all of them. In other respects they have acted in concert for the promotion of mutual profit and in disregard of the order of the court.

In March, 1907, the announcement came from Milwaukee that the former traffic manager of the General Paper Company, Mr. W. H. Hurlburt, of St. Louis, had been put in charge of routing and shipping all the product of the mills formerly tributary to that company. Previously there had appeared in the western field one John J. Hanrahan, said to be a representative of Dean & Shibley, of 26 Broadway, New York. Mr. Hanrahan traveled from mill to mill with a force of nine men, comprising N. M. Jones, of the Katahdin Mills, Lincoln, Me., a sulphite pulp manufacturer; George F. Hardy, a paper-mill architect; Stuart B. Lansing, a paper-machinery maker, of Watertown, N. Y.; four representatives of the American Appraisal Company, and two expert accountants from New York.

Evidence is at hand that former members of the General Paper Company have agreed as to "prices and to the imposition of conditions upon the manufacture, sale, and distribution of the paper manufactured" in direct violation of the decree issued by Judge Sanborn.

[a] Not printed.

Their participation in the action of the American Pulp and Paper Association respecting trade customs—the participation of some of them in the Parks pools and in the various arrangements for penalties on excess production are challenges to the authorities which can not be ignored without danger to the foundations of government.

WITNESSES WHO TOLD OF COMBINATION PLANS.

We can furnish evidence that J. C. Deery, of J. W. Place & Co.; W. B. Moore, a representative of the Berlin Mills, of Berlin, N. H.; a representative of the International Paper Company of New York; a representative of the Richmond Paper Company, and a representative of the Graham Paper Company, of St. Louis, Mo., had knowledge of the uniform raise in prices among manufacturers in advance of the actual announcements by the mills. They told various publishers of an agreement among the mills to uniformly advance prices, and that a uniform price had been fixed; that customers had been allotted to special mills and jobbers; that certain jobbers controlled given territories; that an actual combination existed; that information as to prices, quotations, contracts, and orders was interchanged; that advances in prices were practically simultaneous by the mills. We will furnish evidence that contracts and orders were shifted between mills located East and West without the knowledge or consent of the newspapers, and this occurred between mills that had no known trade relation. These outgivings of proposed increases in prices preceded the alleged increase in the cost of labor and in the cost of wood attending the manufacture of news print paper. Many of the mils have refused to make quotations to newspapers. One of them claimed to have been oversold when its agent stated that it was not then oversold.

PUBLISHERS' SUPPLY PREDERTERMINED.

Publishers who apply for quotations realize that in some intangible way the source of their supply has been predetermined for them and that the price they are to pay has been prearranged for them. In each case the publisher finds that all bids but one are at a prohibitory price. He also finds that he has no remedy against the supply of inferior paper. Unity of action on the part of manufacturers and uniformity of price are obvious.

Publishers who make inquiry of one mill discover that the others have been advised of that inquiry. A secret bureau of information is at work. New selling agencies, representing an aggregation of previously independent mills have merged the output of those mills.

Various mills have been shut down for various periods upon various pretexts. We allege and expect to be able to prove that some of these mills were shut down to starve the paper market and to create a paper famine.

CREATING A PAPER FAMINE.

At the beginning of the year 1907 there was a stock of 60,000 tons of news print paper on hand. August, 1907, should have disclosed a reasonable stock on hand and an accumulation; but the announcement came in that month from paper makers that a paper famine was imminent. The president of the American Paper and Pulp Association wrote in September, 1907, as follows: "Every indication points to the fact that the consumption of news paper has rather more than overtaken the production, and with the natural yearly increase in consumption it would seem as though there would be a real scarcity of news paper during 1908, and perhaps for a much longer time."

INCREASED EXPORTS OF PAPER.

Newspapers find a difficulty in reconciling these statements with increased shipments of paper to Mexico, Cuba, Chile, Argentina, and Japan, and an export of 60,000 tons of news print paper during the year ended June 30, 1907, in disregard of the depleted condition of the domestic market.

Heretofore newspapers have been able to contract for a supply of paper for two or more years, and to adjust their business accordingly. At present they are unable to get bids for more than one year. Jobbers report difficulty in obtaining quotations for any period unless they disclose the names of customers and the use to be made of the paper. When this disclosure is made, jobbers find that satisfactory quotations can be obtained from only one mill. No publisher is safe when mills refuse new orders, as some of them have done.

CHEAPNESS OF AMERICAN PRODUCTION.

Apart from the purely legal or technical phases of the proposition, we can establish to your satisfaction through reports from consuls in Canada on file in the Department of State that the pretexts put forward by paper makers for their advances in prices are not borne out by the facts; that the cost of labor has not increased to the extent represented by the paper makers. Figures printed in the Paper Mill Directory for 1907 shows an increase of only 1 per cent in labor cost of a news print paper mill, the increased production of faster running machines and other improvements having offset the increased pay of the paper-mill employee in up-to-date mills; not one-twentieth of the proposed advance in paper price goes to labor. We can show that news print paper has been recently made and sold in Canada at $32 per ton, including profit of mill, and that American mills can and do make paper more cheaply than Canadian mills by reason of a better supply of skilled labor, cheaper coal, and adequate home market for their products, lower ocean rates, and lower marine insurance on their exports. American mills pay less in the first cost of their machinery, in the cost of repairs and maintenance of machinery, in the cost of mill supplies, and in many other things.

Canadian paper mills with American stockholders have been paying the duty of $6 per ton and have profitably undersold American mills in the American market.

SPECULATING IN WOODLANDS—POURING MILLIONS INTO CANADA.

The latest census bulletins on pulp and pulp wood refer to a gigantic speculation in woodlands by pulp and paper companies, as an explanation for an increase in the quoted cost of pulp wood; but these quotations do not represent any considerable part of the supply of pulp wood used by news print paper makers. The International Paper Company controls 5,000 square miles of timber land. Within the last week it bought 550 square miles on the Restigouche River, New Brunswick, and it is credited with pouring millions of dollars into investments in Canadian forests, though it previously held woodland that would reproduce forever a supply of spruce pulp wood sufficient to make twice the quantity of pulp it now uses. Any purchases of pulp wood by it from outside sources tend to stimulate the price of pulp wood and to furnish a pretext for an advance in price of news print paper.

STUMPAGE.

The stumpage of the International Paper Company is rated on its books at about $1.70 per acre, but its officers claim to be buying outside supplies on a basis which is three times that book valuation. The International Paper Company advanced its price of paper to $50 per ton when it had been invoicing wood in the raw from Canada at $5 per cord. Its officers have been quoted within the last week as saying that $14 had been paid for pulp wood, and that "this phenomenal advance has foreed all companies to mark up the price of paper." Dispatches from Minnesota indicate that the price of pulp wood has dropped to $4.75 per cord or less than one-half the former quotation. Canadian paper makers say that $3 per cord was paid last summer to farmers for pulp wood. Ottawa advices say that there is no increase in the cost of pulp wood.

News print paper mills that are not entirely modern are now making paper at figures that show a profit of more than $20 per ton on the paper prices just announced by the International Paper Company ($52.50 per ton). In other words, for paper delivered, say in New York, up-to-date mills are making a profit of more than 60 per cent on the cost of manufacture, delivery, and storage, and they are making a profit of 40 per cent upon a reasonable allowance for the capital required by a modern plant. Public officials who might look with lenient gaze upon those who were trying to save themselves from loss are not justified in countenancing such oppression of innocent buyers by criminal combinations of paper makers.

PROFITS OF 60 PER CENT.

In 1905, when the International Paper Company was admittedly selling paper at $38 per ton, delivered on the sidewalk, it made a profit of $5 per ton, as shown by its annual report, indicating that the cost delivered on the sidewalk was $33 per ton, and that the cost at mills was averaging about $29 per ton. Many newspapers are at the mercy of this combination of mills that groups together twenty-four plants, one of which (Haverhill), scheduled at a valuation of $228,000, was promptly dismantled. Another mill (Harkimer), scheduled at $592,800, had not been profitable and is not now in operation. Another mill (Fall Mountain), scheduled at $4,105,507, had one machine that was sixty years old.

These illegal combinations have imposed burdens upon consumers of all kinds of paper, and, if carried out as indicated by the published utterances of the leaders of the various groups, they will add at least $60,000,000 per annum to the cost of paper as compared with two years ago.

We therefore ask that you direct that proceedings be instituted with a view to obtaining immediate relief.

Yours, truly, HERMAN RIDDER,
President American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I also hold in my hand the advance sheets of an editorial which will appear in the next issue of the Commoner from the pen of Hon. William J. Bryan, giving his opinion concerning the so-called "Williams currency bill," indorsing the same and recommending its support to Members of the House. For the same reason, to wit, that I do not desire to take up the time of the House, I ask unanimous consent that it be published as a part of my remarks. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] asks unanimous consent that the paper which represents advance sheets of an editorial to be published in the Commoner be included and added as a part of his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

THE WILLIAMS CURRENCY BILL.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, the Democratic leader of the House of Representatives, has introduced a bill, a copy of which will be found upon another page. It was introduced after a conference with other Democrats of the Senate and House—a conference which Mr. Bryan attended—and has the support of practically all of the Democrats. The Commoner commends this bill to its readers and to the country as a vast improvement over the present national banking act and over both the Aldrich and Fowler bills.

In the first place, it requires the reserves to be kept in the banks and repeals the law which permits these reserves to be loaned to other banks. This provision requiring the reserves to be kept at home protects the country from the concentration of money in New York, where it is not only loaned for speculative purposes, but where it can be retained to the embarrassment of outside banks. In order that the banks may not be crippled by this requirement another provision of the bill permits national, State, and municipal bonds to be counted in the reserve up to one-half of the reserve. As these bonds draw as high rate of interest as the banks now receive on that part of the reserve which is loaned to banks in reserve cities, there is no loss to the bank in keeping its reserves at home.

These bonds which are kept in the reserve are, by another provision of the bill, made the basis for an emergency currency, consisting of national notes loaned to the banks upon rate of interest which will compel the retirement of the notes when the emergency is over.

These three provisions—first, that the reserves shall be kept in the banks; second that half of the reserves may be kept in bonds, and, third, that these bonds may be used as the basis for an emergency currency—will protect the country from any such panic as that through which we are passing, for the present panic began with the refusal of the New York banks to return the reserves deposited with them.

Under the Williams bill these reserves will be kept in the home banks, and therefore always ready for use. The banks can not say that a hardship is imposed upon them by this requirement, because the reserve held in bonds is drawing interest, and these bonds furnish a basis sufficiently large for any emergency currency that may be needed. Every interest therefore is protected without any hardship to anyone. Whatever emergency currency we need ought to be issued by the Government, and the Williams bill provides for such an emergency currency.

The second provision of the bill requires the banking associations of the reserve cities to keep not less than half of their reserve in gold or gold certificates. This puts upon the banks in the reserve cities the burden of carrying a part of the gold reserve, and thus relieves the Government to some extent.

Section 3 substitutes salaries for fees for bank examiners, and is a step in the right direction.

But the Williams bill goes further. It adds restrictions upon the banks which look to the prevention of failures. The cause of failures is to be found in the use of the money of the banks by officers and directors. The present law limiting loans to any one person to one-tenth of the capital and surplus is merely directory and is violated with impunity. The Williams bill provides a penalty for such loaning, and thus makes it a criminal offense to violate the rule laid down as to loans. This will stop loaning of an excessive amount to any one individual and will in itself go far toward preventing failures.

Section 5 adds another valuable restriction, namely, that the aggregate loans of a bank shall not amount to more than seven times its paid-up capital and unimpaired surplus. Some of our banks are top-heavy. They have enormous deposits and enormous loans, but have a small capital and surplus back of the loans and deposits.

No argument need be advanced in proof of the statement that the bank is safe just in proportion as its capital and surplus are large when compared with its deposits. One of the large banks that failed during the present panic had deposits to the amount of seventeen times its capital and surplus, and sometimes the deposits amount to as much as twenty or thirty times the capital and surplus. It is readily seen that a bank with $100,000 capital and surplus and $500,000 deposits is conducted upon a safer basis than a bank with $100,000 capital and surplus and $2,000,000 deposits. In the first case, the bank could loan its capital of $100,000 and 75 per cent of its deposits—$375,000—or a total of $475,000. In this case its capital and surplus of $100,000 would offset a shrinkage of $100,000 in its loans, or shrinkage of more than 20 per cent. In the latter case the bank could loan $100,000 capital and surplus plus $1,500,000, or a total of $1,600,000. In this case the capital and surplus of $100,000 would cover a shrinkage of only about 6 per cent.

The Williams bill, by limiting the loans to seven times the capital and surplus, compels the bank to keep all of its deposits on hand after it has loaned seven times its capital and surplus, and as there is no profit in accepting deposits that can not be loaned, the bank will at once increase its capital and surplus in order to make use of its deposits. In other words, it will increase the basis upon which it is doing business and the margin which protects depositors from any shrinkage in the value of the bank's securities. Oklahoma, so far as the editor knows, is the first State to attempt this regulation, and the loans are there limited to eight times the capital and surplus. The Williams bill makes the bank even safer by putting the ratio at seven.

Section 14 of the Williams bill makes it a criminal offense for any officer or director of a bank to knowingly loan money for gambling purposes. While this provision may be difficult to enforce, it is a declaration that will, to some extent at least, restrain the officer and will do good, and Mr. WILLIAMS might have gone further and made it a criminal offense for any official of a bank to buy or sell stock or farm products on a margin, a margin being defined as less than one-half of the purchase price. A man who handles money of others ought not to be subjected to the temptation into which gambling leads one.

Another important provision of the Williams bill relates to the deposits of Government money in banks. The bill provides that Government deposits shall be made in response to sealed bids and the money divided, where bids are equal, between the States in proportion to population, and banks making the same bid are to be treated alike. This provision for the loaning of Government money at competitive rates eliminates favoritism which has existed up to this time, and at the same time secures to the Government a profit. Where the security is fixed as it is in the Williams bill, there is no reason why the loans should not be made to the bank offering the highest rate of interest, the deposits in any bank being limited to 50 per cent of the paid-up capital.

Mr. WILLIAMS is to be congratulated upon inserting these provisions in the bill for it points a way to the only remedy for favoritism in the loaning of money.

But the Williams bill not only provides for an emergency currency and the better regulation of banks, but it provides for a guaranty fund for the protection of depositors. A semi-annual tax of one-sixteenth of 1 per cent is levied upon the banks voluntarily entering the plan until the sum of $15,000,000 is collected. After that the assessment is suspended until it is necessary to reimburse the fund for money paid to the depositors of failed banks. This sum is held by the Treasurer of the United States and administered for the protection of depositors. The fact that the banks enter the system voluntarily rather than under compulsion has no disadvantages, for all banks will be able to enter the system, or if they do not, the people having an opportunity to protect themselves will knowingly assume the risk if they deposit in unsecured banks.

WHY OPPOSED.

The bill provides that the money should be drawn from the funds "after the exhaustion of the assets of any failed bank." This ought to be amended so as to provide for the payment of the depositors immediately upon the suspension of the bank in order to protect the community and the depositors from embarrassment, and then the Government can proceed to collect the assets of the bank, including the 100 per cent liability of stockholders, and reimburse the fund. This amendment would improve the bill, and there could be no objection to it.

THEN BANKS WOULD NOT ENTER.

The only other amendment which needs to be suggested is that the Government should have the right to collect additional assessments if necessary to protect depositors so that there would be no danger of any time elapsing between the failure of the bank and the payment of depositors. The banks can very well afford to risk these additional assessments in order to give absolute security to depositors. While the fund is sufficient for all probable emergencies, the law should provide for possible emergencies, as well as probable ones, and in subjecting all of the banks of the system to unlimited assessment, it is simply giving the benefit of the doubt to the depositor, who is likely to be more timid than the banker. The banker knows by experience that the assessment could not be large, and therefore takes no great risk in making the depositors' security absolute.

The guaranty system proposed by the Williams bill is open to State banks as well as national banks, and very properly so. A law that provides for the protection of national-bank depositors only would discriminate between the State bank, just as a law protecting depositors of State banks only would discriminate between national banks. It is well that the system proposed in the State and in the nation should be broad enough to avoid discrimination, and thus put all banks upon the same level when they are willing to stand upon the same footing as to inspection and security.

Mr. WILLIAMS has rendered his party a distinguished service in presenting this currency reform measure. The Democrats can afford to support it unitedly and then ask the judgment of the country between it and the measures proposed by the Republican leaders. The Williams bill meets the difficulty from the standpoint of all the people, the Fowler bill and the Aldrich bill look to the interest of the bankers alone. If the Democrats of the House will stand by the Williams bill and put the Republicans on record, the Republicans will have to support the Williams bill or risk retirement at the next election.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GREENE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CLAPP, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. OWEN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CATHOLIC CHURCH CLAIMS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, there are only three questions involved in this controversy. The first is the character of the claim, the second the amount, and the third the ownership. These are the three problems before the Committee of the Whole House for consideration. The character of the claims has been quite fully explained to the committee by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and also the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES]. They are claims for use and occupation of church property by the Federal Government during the insurrection in the Philippine Islands, including schools and hospitals, and for damages resulting from acts of destruction by occupants of the Federal Government while it was in possession of the property. The Hull board made a careful and exhaustive investigation of these claims, and made a report recommending that $363,030.19 be appropriated by the Federal Government in payment of the claims. The board in its report likewise recommended or suggested an additional $40,000 that might be paid as the share of liability for which the Federal Government might be responsible in the loss and destruction of sacred ornaments, vestments, and utensils in the churches, convents, and other buildings.

The chairman of the board said the evidence upon that question was not very clear. But I want to call the attention of the committee to this proposition: Colonel Hull, in his testimony before the Committee on Insular Affairs, reported that the board, in determining the question of liability, only considered the property actually appropriated by the Federal Government and the rents of property actually occupied by the Government during the occupancy. That the board decided not to include wanton cases of damage and destruction by our soldiers, notwithstanding these acts of damage and destruction occurred by them as our tenants of church buildings, convents, and educational institutions while the Federal Government was in possession of the property, and had excluded the rightful owner from its possession and control. There is a considerable element of damage of that kind that has a recognized basis in law and justice that the board admitted it did not consider at all. That element is as well based in law and justice as any claim that was allowed.

There is no doubt in the world that when the Federal Government takes possession of a building of a noncombatant in time of warfare and converts it to its own use for the time being, it becomes a tenant, it assumes responsibility that belongs to a tenant. It has excluded the rightful owner, taken from him the right to control the property and protect it against wanton acts of destruction; and by its own occupancy, where it has destroyed furniture and decorations, carried away sacred vestments and ornaments, in that relation the Federal Government, under the law of war, is responsible, and that substantial element of damage, Mr. Chairman, was entirely ignored by the Hull board. I do not know how much it may have been. A number of thousands of dollars in all probability would be required to cover it. At one time, in the magnificent cathedral at Manila, the United States Government had several thousand Spanish soldiers confined for a number of months as prisoners of war, and the damage to that property by those prisoners was outrageous. No allowance was made for that.

Again, the Committee on Insular Affairs, in reaching its conclusions, decided to add $40,000, as the Hull board recommended or suggested, as the share of the Federal Government for the taking and destruction of sacred ornaments of the churches and convents. That claim was about $288,000 in the aggregate. The board said that the share for which the United States might be held responsible would amount to about $40,000.

Now, I want to call the attention of the committee, too, to the fact that Colonel Hull stated to the committee that, in his judgment, if Congress should allow $500,000 upon this claim, it would not be excessive; it would not be more than the church was justly entitled to.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I only have ten minutes, and if I yield to interruptions I can not present the questions I have in mind as fully as I desire to. I hope the gentleman will pardon me.

Secretary Taft, who is familiar with the situation, has recommended an allowance of $500,000. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, the $403,030.19 falls many thousand dollars below fair compensation for the actual damage that this Government committed and for which it was clearly liable under the law.

Now, another question is: To whom does this damage belong? There can be little doubt about that. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], my genial friend, has made a very elaborate argument to prove that the question of title is in doubt. Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that no man who is a lawyer and who has not started in wrong, who has not conceived some mental bias before undertaking the examination, can read the opinion which is appended to this report and not come to the conclusion that the title to all property situated like this in the Philippine Islands was conclusively adjudicated by the decision of the supreme court of the Philippine government. The opinion is here. We present it in the report, and I make the assertion that the question of title was adjudicated as clearly as it was possible for it to be. The plaintiff went into the court declaring he was the owner and entitled to possession of the property. The defendant answered title and right of possession in the municipality under which he held possession. The municipality was made a party defendant upon its own petition, and asserted ownership and right of possession, and these were the questions in issue.

The case was filed in a court of general jurisdiction, not before a justice of the peace. Jurisdiction in such cases was given courts of first instance in the islands by the organic act passed by Congress creating the government of the Philippine Islands, with the right to appeal to the supreme court. The local court decided in favor of the plaintiff, and the case went to the supreme court of the islands regularly on appeal, and the supreme court took up the propositions one after another, every proposition that was presented in the record, and decided fully, clearly, and conclusively that the title and right of possession were in the Roman Catholic Church. The court devoted two-thirds or three-fourths of its long opinion in discussing the question of ownership, of title, upon the theory, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] intimated in his questions, that the right of possession followed the ownership.

(The time of Mr. CRUMPACKER having expired, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin yielded to him three minutes.)

Mr. OVERSTREET. What was that decision? The gentleman has not stated it yet.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The decision was that the Roman Catholic Church of the Philippine Islands was the owner, that it held all the title to the property there was in existence, that the title never was in the Crown of Spain, that it never was in the United States, that it never was in the Independent Church. Why, Aglipay, the founder of the Independent Church has placed on file with the government down there a renunciation, a disclaimer of any right or title to the damages in controversy. Those damages accrued before there was any Independent Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands. The church was not organized until after the damages had accrued, and nobody questions that when the damages accrued the title and the right of property were in the Roman Catholic Church. There is no legal problem in this case. It has been adjudicated by the court of last resort in a typical case, as the court practically said; and the court took occasion to say that the title to no property situated as that was in the Philippine Archipelago was anywhere else than in the Catholic Church. It is as fair and clear and conclusive an adjudication of title and right of possession of all that class of property as it is possible to make, and I make this statement knowing that the opinion of the court is within ready reach of every member of the Committee of the Whole. The Aglipayan church is said by the gentleman from Virginia to number five or six million communicants.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. No; I did not say that. I said three million.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I took occasion this morning to call up the War Department upon that question, and Major McIntyre told me that at no time had it exceeded one million, according to the best information, and that included men, women, and children, and he said that to-day the communicants were not one-third of a million. They have but one small chapel in the great city of Manila, in which city there are sixteen important Roman Catholic churches.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States occupied 407 different church properties in the Philippines, or at least that many claims were presented. The contention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] is that there ought to be 407 lawsuits to determine the title to those properties, when everybody concedes and everybody knows that they were all held by precisely the same title, and that the question has been decided in the Ramirez case, to which he has referred. Now, here is the syllabus of that case: There could be not more than three possible claimants to the title of this property—one, the Government of the United States, deriving through the Kingdom of Spain; the other, the Roman Catholic Church; and, third, the new claimant, which does not claim, but on whose behalf the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] bases largely his contention, the Aglipayan branch of the Catholic Church.

There was some difference of opinion in the supreme court, not the inferior court, but the supreme court of the Philippine Islands. Five of the judges of that court held, as stated in the syllabus, that "prior to the cession of the Philippines to the United States the King of Spain was not the owner of the consecrated churches therein and had no right to the possession thereof. The exclusive right to such possession was in the Roman Catholic Church, and such right has continued since that cession, and now exists."

The minority of the court, one judge, held that the legal title to the churches was in the United States, but he concurred in the judgment upon the ground that the right to possession and control of these churches is in the Roman Catholic Church so long as they continue to use them for the purpose to which they were dedicated. Even the dissenting judge conceded, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES], I think, must concede, that the exclusive right to the occupancy and possession of these churches was in the Roman Catholic Church. Why need we go into any refinement of distinction between the right to ownership and the right to possession through all time, if not eternity?

Mr. HARDY. Does it not also give them the exclusive and perpetual right of possession?

Mr. OLMSTED. The exclusive and the perpetual right just as long as they are occupied for ecclesiastical purposes. Now, if I am in possession of a building, if you please, and the courts decide that I have the exclusive right to the possession of that property forever, and you blow off a chimney or blow out the windows, who is damaged? Am I not? And if I am driven out of the possession, as the Roman Catholic Church was driven out of the possession of these buildings in the Philippine Islands, who is damaged?

Whose property was taken? Whose right was taken? Was it not the property—the property right—of the Roman Catholic Church? What other claimants could there be? This, Mr. Chairman, is simply a bill to pay rent. The Government of the United States occupied these buildings; it owes the rent to somebody. The question is to whom the rent is due. To whom is it owing if not to the body whom the Supreme Court has decided—not only in this case, but in a later case, only last December, and from which the gentleman from Virginia has read—has decided that the exclusive right of possession is in the Roman Catholic Church in perpetuity?

Mr. CHANEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. For a question.

Mr. CHANEY. I want to inquire if the decision of the dissenting judge that the title was in the United States was not on the theory that the church had only been given the right of property on the ground that it was to be used for public worship?

Mr. OLMSTED. That is the fact. There was no difference of opinion among any of the judges as to the exclusive right of possession. They all held that the exclusive and perpetual right of possession and occupancy was in the Roman Catholic Church. Everybody conceded it. The Aglipayan faction of the church has renounced all claim. The Kingdom of Spain, for obvious reasons, can not make any claim of ownership now, and the court has decided that it never had any title.

Now, why should we waste words on the mere question of whether or not these cases decide in whom is the legal title—who would finally receive it if the churches should cease to use it for church purposes? The Roman Catholic Church claimed rental and damage to the amount of $2,442,916.13. The board allowed $363,030.19. The Secretary of War and the chairman of that board held that the damages that had accrued for deterioration as the result of damages by the United States during its occupancy had caused an additional damage, so that $500,000 would not be an excessive amount to be paid at the present time. The Committee on Insular Affairs has allowed a total of $403,030.19 as rent for occupancy and damages to the property during the occupancy by the United States, or by those whom it authorized to occupy them. Nothing whatever is allowed for damages by insurgents, who were in possession of many of the properties before the United States took possession.

Now, let me summarize the matter. The Government having for its purposes occupied some or all of these buildings—some for use as hospitals, some for the housing of troops, some as barracks, etc.—the church made claim for rental and also for damages. The Secretary of War appointed a so-called "board of church claims" for the sole purpose of investigating and reporting upon the matter. This board consisted of Lieut. Col. John A. Hull, judge-advocate; Lieut. Col. Alexander O. Brodie, military secretary, and First Lieut. J. W. Moore, Second Cavalry. They went upon the ground and spent some six months in making a thorough investigation. The total claims presented for rent and damages amounted to $2,442,963.13. In addition to this there were claims made for articles of cult and ornamentation, claimed to be missing, to the value of $289,222.50. The board allowed nothing except for rent and damages to the property while in the occupation and use of the United States Government.

Nothing whatever was allowed for damages incident to military operations as an incident of war. For instance, take this extract from the report of the board:

No. 256. Paco, Manila. Claim for damages to church, convent, and effects, amounting to ₱300,000 (amount of ₱554,785, as stated in Exhibit B, was taken from an abstract and is incorrect). We recommend that nothing be paid.

That church was occupied by the insurgents at the outbreak of hostilities in February, 1899. In order to dislodge and subdue them it was necessary for the United States artillery to shell the church. During the engagement it was set on fire and destroyed. The damage was an incident of war, and no claims of that kind were allowed.

Some of the claims were for damages done by the insurgents. These were not allowed, as the United States was not responsible for such damages. Then there were claims for rentals and damages for occupation and use by officers and agents of the civil government of the Philippines. Those claims were all disallowed on the ground that if any lawful claim existed it was against the Philippine government and not against the United States. None of the claims for lost articles of cult and ornamentation were allowed. The evidence concerning such articles was very meager. There was little or no evidence that the articles had been taken by United States soldiers. In many instances the property had been abandoned by the church and occupied by the insurgents before the United States troops came along. It is more than likely that if any articles were stolen they were stolen by the insurgents before our troops got there. In any event, wanton damages by soldiers, thefts of property, etc., are never allowed in claims against the United States. The same principle is applied in this case as was applied here at home during the Spanish war.

In my own district we had Camp Meade. The Government paid rentals for properties occupied and they paid for damages to the property caused by the Army necessarily resulting from the occupancy by the Army, but where rails were stolen from fences, chickens from roosts, pigs from pens, or horses from stables no payment has been made by the Government. The theory is, as I understand it, that such wanton acts when committed by persons who are soldiers are committed by them not as soldiers, but in their individual capacities, and can not be construed as in any event the act of the Government nor so as to make the Government responsible. The reductions that were made brought the total down to $363,030.19, which was the sum allowed by the board of church claims for rent and damages for the use and occupancy by the Government. It was urged that deterioration of the properties resulted from the Government use and damage had followed the Government occupancy, and the Committee on Insular Affairs was urged to allow a total of $500,000. This it refused to do, but did add $40,000 to the award of the board, bringing the total up to $403,030.19, and the bill now under discussion provides for the payment of this amount.

The very full and comprehensive report accompanying this bill shows numerous precedents where Congress has appropriated money to pay just such claims as these to nearly every religious denomination arising out of the occupancy and use of churches during the civil war. Such payments have been made to the German Evangelical Church, Presbyterian Church, and others, and only a few years ago, in the Fifty-fifth Congress, there was appropriated $288,000 to the Methodist Church South upon just such a claim. This is not a question of politics or religion. It is merely a question of the Government paying the proper rental for its use of property belonging to others.

The report of the minority of the Committee on Insular Affairs lays considerable stress upon the fact that there is now in the Philippine Islands an Independent Catholic Church, headed by Gregario Aglipay and sometimes known as the "Aglipayan Church" or faction. What have we to do with that? The Aglipayan Church or faction did not exist until 1902, and the occupancy of these buildings by the United States Government, for which rental is now claimed, occurred prior to that time.

The minority report is devoted mainly to a vain and fruitless effort to show that the title to these lands is not in the Catholic Church. The judicial decisions cited upon that point do not so decide. The case of Barlin v. Ramirez seems to me conclusive upon the subject. But it is urged that this case originated some time prior to 1905, not in the supreme court, but in the court of first instance of Ambos Camarines, and that on the 24th of July, 1905, the Philippine government passed, or the Philippine Commission passed, an act giving the supreme court original jurisdiction in such cases. They did not claim that the act gave the supreme court exclusive original jurisdiction, and that tribunal certainly held that it was still proper for it to pass upon a case which had, prior to 1905, arisen in an inferior court, for the Ramirez case was decided by the supreme court itself on the 24th of November, 1906. Furthermore, two cases which did originate in the supreme court itself, after the passage of the act of 1905, were decided by that tribunal in December, 1907, and the principles of the Ramirez case were again decided and distinctly affirmed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all gentlemen have the opportunity to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that must be decided by the House.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the payment to the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Manila of the sum of $403,030.19. The bill is to make a settlement with the Roman Catholic Church for the use and occupation of its property in the Philippines and for damages to that property by the United States troops. A military board, styled the "board on church claims," convened in the Philippines, has examined each item included in the award, and this appropriation is to carry out the findings of that board.

The bill itself comes before the House as the report of a majority of the Committee on Insular Affairs, of which committee I am a member. A minority of that committee, however, are opposed to the measure, and their views are set forth in a report which has been filed with that of the majority.

The objection of the minority is on the ground that "no sound public policy is to be subserved by the appropriation by Congress of a considerable portion of the amount recommended," and in particular denies the right of the Roman Catholic Church to have the sum awarded paid to it.

This bill is a measure of importance, and as I strongly believe in its merits and differ from certain of my associates on the committee in my views on it, I wish to state my attitude and the reasons which I believe entitle the bill to receive the support of the House.

A clear understanding of the grounds on which the claims are supported requires a brief glance at the history of the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippines, an appreciation of the relations between that church and the King of Spain and the people of the Philippine Islands themselves, a knowledge of the arrangement under which the churches were built, and of the events connected with our use of them.

The relations of the former government of the Philippine Islands and the Roman Catholic Church were of the closest kind and existed from the first settlement of the islands by the Spanish. One of the main motives for foreign conquest, and one to which the Crown of Spain devoted especial attention, was the christianizing of the native populations of the new countries. The relations of the church and the King of Spain in these new possessions found expression from time to time in various concordats. In one of the early concordats the right to the tithes and patronage of the church was transferred to the King of Spain, who in turn agreed, as part of his responsibilities, to maintain the churches and furnish them with priests and aid in their construction and maintenance. The churches themselves, which were constructed from time to time, were built with funds furnished partly by the Roman Catholic Church directly, partly from the Spanish treasury, and partly by donation from the local members.

The church itself was a part of the Spanish Government in the Philippines, and there was no clear line of demarcation between civil and ecclesiastical matters, the Spanish Crown, in temporal matters at least, exercising a very large jurisdiction over the Spanish church. The cession of the Philippine Islands, in taking from the place of sovereign a government so intimately associated with the church and placing in that position a nation which by its constitution and by its traditions was precluded from all association with ecclesiastical affairs, raised many questions most perplexing in their nature.

The present Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, in an address to His Holiness the Pope, said:

> The transfer of sovereignty and all governmental property rights and interests from the Crown of Spain to the United States in the Philippine Islands, contained in the treaty of Paris, was a transfer from a government between which and the Church of Rome there had been in those islands the closest association in property, religion, and politics to a Government which by the law of its being is absolutely prevented from having such associations with any church. To make the transfer effectual, and at the same time just, it is obvious that the proper line of division must be drawn between what were really civil property interests of the Crown of Spain and what were religious trusts of the Catholic Church, and that all union of civil and clerical agencies for performance of political functions must end. (Report of Secretary of War, 1902, p. 237.)

Tracts of land of considerable area had been acquired by monastic orders in the Philippines, and in 1896 there arose an insurrection directed largely against these friars, who occupied and cultivated by native labor these large pieces of land. During this insurrection in 1896 many of the convents were occupied both by insurgents and by Spanish, and no small destruction of property ensued. The insurrection of the summer of 1898, which occurred against the Spanish Government, brought on the same conditions, and the church property, much of which had remained unrepaired since the first insurrection, was used and injured once more by the combatants.

TREATY OF PARIS.

The treaty of Paris, signed December 10, 1898, ceded to the United States the Philippine Islands and all the property located there which belonged to the Crown of Spain. The new sovereignty, however, was not accepted without a struggle and the insurrection continued the next year against the United States. The great damage to the churches was inflicted in this insurrection in 1899, and it was during this insurrection that the use of the church property by our troops occurred.

In 1902 a Philippine priest named Aglipay started a schism in the Roman Catholic Church. Aglipay had refused previously to obey the order of the Archbishop of Manila to present himself and come away from Aguinaldo and had been defrocked for disobedience. In his opposition to the Roman Catholic Church Aglipay took the position that the municipalities were the owners of the churches and organized a body called the "Independent Filipino Church," constituting himself its head. This body denied the authority of the Roman Catholic bishops over the churches and claimed that each community held the title to the church situated within its borders. The churches in some of the towns joined in this revolt and essayed to turn out the Roman Catholic priests who refused to renounce their allegiance to the Roman Catholic bishop of that diocese.

In fact, on January 10, 1903, Secretary Taft, then civil governor of the Philippine Islands, sent to all the governors of the provinces a letter in which he cautioned them to avoid so mixing themselves in the controversies as to cause them to be criticised, and warned them that the right of occupation or ownership of property was one to be determined by the courts.

Cases involving the right of possession of the church property immediately arose and have been so determined by the supreme court of the Philippines as to leave no doubt of the soundness of this measure in providing for payment to the Roman Catholic Church.

CLAIMS ARE FOR RENT FOR THE CHURCH BUILDINGS USED BY OUR TROOPS AND DAMAGES FOR THEIR INJURY.

The claims the payment of which this bill seeks to provide are, in part, for rent of the church buildings for their use by our troops and, in part, for damages incident to such occupation. The churches were the principal buildings in the towns, and the United States troops used them in most instances for barracks. They were obliged to do this, as the church, or convento, was, commonly, the only building in the town suitable for sheltering troops. In some instances they were used as places in which to detain prisoners. While our troops occupied the buildings it not infrequently happened that they would be attacked. Even those buildings which escaped attack sustained serious damage from the occupation by soldiers. The occupation of the troops was paid for at the time in some instances, but usually either there was no one there with whom to treat, or the commanding officer preferred to occupy the buildings and allow the amount of the rent to be determined later.

EARLY RECOGNITION OF THE EXISTENCE OF CLAIMS.

Owing to the close relations of the Roman Catholic Church with the Spanish Government when the latter transferred its rights to the United States, many matters of importance required adjustment, and the recognition that claims of this nature existed is found in the earliest correspondence of our officials. When, in 1902, the then Secretary of War, Mr. Root, sent the present Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, to the Philippines in relation to the sale of the friars' lands, he instructed him to take up certain other matters with the Church of Rome, and said:

Provision should be made for ascertaining what rentals, if any, ought to be paid for conventos and other church buildings which have been occupied by United States troops during the insurrection, this being, of course, subject to further specific action by Congress. (Report of War Dept., 1902, Vol. I, p. 235.)

In furtherance of these instructions, Mr. Taft, when governor-general of the Philippine Islands in 1902, in his letter to Cardinal Rampolla, representing the Roman Catholic Church, agreed to—

Direct the general commanding * * * to ascertain what damages have been done, and in each case what reasons, if any, for denying an obligation to pay rentals and damages.

Following out such orders the general commanding in the Philippines directed that an investigation into the claims for rent and damages be made. Such an investigation was made and information gathered, which was sent to the military division of the Philippines and later turned over and used by the board on church claims.

The board on church claims, whose award this bill proposes to approve, was convened under instructions from the Secretary of War, dated June 12, 1905, which directed that a board of officers be appointed known as the "board on church claims," to be composed of three officers, with instructions to—

Ascertain what sums appear to be due for our use and occupation of churches, convents, and for damages or injury which have been done to such buildings by troops as a consequence of such use since the occupation of the islands by the military forces of the United States. * * * The board will use the evidence collected by the military division of the Philippines * * * but will not be restricted to the information so obtained. * * * A report will be submitted through the commanding general to the Secretary of War.

Following out these orders, Messrs. J. A. Hull, lieutenant-colonel and judge-advocate; Alexander O. Brodie, lieutenant-colonel and military secretary, and Maj. William J. Gibson, general staff, later succeeded by J. W. Moore, first lieutenant, Second Cavalry, were appointed. The board commenced its sittings on August 1, 1905, and on January 15, 1906, submitted its report, which is as follows:

Four hundred and seven claims were presented, amounting to 4,885,926.26 pesos, of which is recommended for payment the following:

For rent		₱579, 598. 87
Damages		110, 093. 50
Total		689, 692. 37
In addition were added:
For rent	₱34, 158
Damages	2, 210
		36, 368. 00
		726, 060. 37

Or $363,030.19.

This report is accompanied with the recommendation—

That Congress be asked to appropriate the sum of $363,030.19 United States currency, and if Congress should desire to compensate the church for the carrying away of sacred ornaments, that $40,000 additional should be paid.

THE UNITED STATES STANDS AS RESPECTING RIGHTS OF PROPERTY.

In considering the question of the advisability, justice, and propriety of paying the Roman Catholic Church these claims for rental of its churches occupied by the United States troops, it is important to see the position which the United States has placed itself in with regard to claims of this nature. In each of the official documents on the situation occurs the mention of the churches and private property and the recognition of the United States as their protector, the duties of which position can now with propriety scarcely be disregarded. The articles of capitulation of the city of Manila, dated August 14, 1898, and signed by representatives of General Merritt's army and of the Spanish army, provide:

ART. 7. This city, its inhabitants, its churches and religious worship, its educational establishments, and its private property of all descriptions are placed under the special safeguard of the faith and honor of the American Army.

While not quoted, these provisions, it is understood, were made strictly in accordance with the orders of President McKinley and bound the United States to be particularly on its guard against any violations by its soldiers of the rights of property of the people of Manila. Following out the articles of capitulation, after entering the city of Manila General Merritt, in command of the United States forces, issued a proclamation, paragraph 6 of which provided:

All churches and places devoted to religious worship and to the arts and sciences, all educational institutions, libraries, scientific collections, and museums are, so far as possible, to be protected; and all destruction or intentional defacement of such places or property, of historical monuments, archives, or works of science and art, is prohibited, save when required by urgent military necessity. Severe punishment will be meted out for all violations of this regulation.

After the cessation of hostilities, the treaty of Paris, signed December 10, 1898, by which the Philippines were ceded to the United States, set out the rights of the two nations, and in paragraph 8 provided:

And it is hereby provided that the relinquishment or cession, as the case may be, to which the preceding paragraph refers can not in any respect impair the property or rights which by law belong to the peaceful possession of property of all kinds, of provinces, municipalities, public or private establishments, ecclesiastical or civic bodies, or any other associations having legal capacity to acquire and possess property in the aforesaid territories, renounced or ceded, or of private individuals, of whatsoever nationality such individuals may be.

It will be seen in all these documents that in each instance where the protection of private property is mentioned property belonging to the church is specifically included, and the latter's possessions are placed particularly under the charge and protection of the United States Government, a situation rendered especially necessary on account of the dependency and relations of that church with the previous government of the islands.

THE FINDINGS OF THE BOARD ARE JUST AND SHOULD BE SUPPORTED.

Following out the directions of the Secretary of War, the general commanding the Philippines appointed, as we have seen, men of the highest standing, who gave to the task most painstaking inquiry. The board on church claims (so styled) had before it the information gathered by the orders of the military commander, and it also investigated as much as possible the circumstances of each case. There were submitted to the board and investigated by it 466 cases, of which it made a report, recomending only about 14 per cent of the allowances claimed. In sending its report, the board states that it based its recommendations—

On the reports of officers sent to investigate and report upon the property and such other pertinent information as could be obtained from records of various offices and other sources. (Report of Board on Church Claims, p. 60.)

The board came to its conclusion only after additional instructions and adopted a conservative attitude in determining the class of claims it would allow. When it based its recommendations following legal precedent it excluded any claim for compensation for any of these four classes:

(1) Damages by insurgents;
(2) Wanton damage by soldiers of the American Army;
(3) Damages incident to military operations; and
(4) Claims for use and occupancy and damages by servants of the civil government.

The award reached by the board not only appears most reasonable upon its face and is supported by all the outward evidence which the board refers to, but it is, in addition, regarded as most conservative, both by the Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, and by Major Porter, either of whom is exceptionally qualified to form a judgment on the subject, and both of whom testified before our committee as to their belief in the reasonableness of the recommendations on which this bill is based:

(Hearing, Committee on Insular Affairs, January 20, 1898.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, the aggregate of claims was approximately 4,000,000 pesos, and the award was $363,000. In your judgment, does that err on the side of extravagance as against the Government?

Secretary TAFT. No, sir; I do not think it does.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think it is a perfectly just award?

Secretary TAFT. Yes.

(Hearing, Committee on Insular Affairs, January 21, 1898.)

Major PORTER. I think the award is extremely conservative, Mr. Chairman. That is my opinion of it. I have no interest in it one way or another; but the impression made on my mind, from what I have seen in the Philippines during the two years and a half that I was in the islands, is that the estimates are very moderate, particularly considering the difficulty of replacing the property destroyed.

THE UNITED STATES TOOK POSSESSION OF AND USED THE BUILDINGS AND SHOULD PAY THE OWNERS.

The United States took possession of these buildings against the wishes, in most instances, of those having possession of them, or, at best, without any contract with the owners. It occupied, in all fairness, no better position than an ordinary tenant, and should pay the owner a reasonable compensation for the use and occupation of his buildings, and should be held to the same responsibility to its landlord as would be an ordinary tenant under similar circumstances.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH A GREAT POWER FOR THE UPLIFTING OF THE PEOPLE.

Need I say that the Roman Catholic Church stands forth as one of the greatest Christianizing forces of the world? I am not myself a member of that church, but I appreciate the enormous power which it is exercising for the good of the community. The earnest seeking for the uplifting of all humanity and the lofty character of its ideals make the Roman Catholic Church a powerful force in raising the standards of all our citizens. In developing and strengthening the moral fiber of our people that church constitutes to-day, in my opinion, one of the most powerful factors for the protection of American ideals and the upholding of our institutions.

Great as is its importance as a power for good amongst our people of the United States, it occupies in the Philippines an even closer relation to the people's lives, and its work there can but hasten the day of their independence. Developed there as a part of the government, in a community where the church had an important function in the political life, it became for the inhabitants of the Philippines an essential factor in their daily affairs.

The prosperity of the people of the Philippines is desired by us all, and we look forward anxiously to that day, which for me can not arrive too soon, when absolute independence shall be granted to them. It can not be doubted that in strengthening and aiding the people of those islands the Roman Catholic Church is hastening the time when our statesmen can no longer deny to these people the right to govern themselves. As enabling the Roman Catholic Church better to carry out its work, this bill assists in speeding that time.

The Roman Catholic Church suffered great losses through this unsettled period in the Philippines, and its misfortunes in crippling its work were misfortunes not alone to the church, but the Philippine people. Many of these losses were inflicted before the occupation by the United States, or were losses incident to war, or of such a nature that they can not be compensated for, and this present bill in no wise seeks to make appropriation for them, but only for the part of the damage caused directly by the United States troops. That the misfortunes of the church are misfortunes to the people in the Philippines a glance at the testimony given before our committee will show:

The church authorities as at present constituted are our friends, and help us in the establishment and preservation of law and order in these islands, and are upholders of the authority of the United States. (Report, Board of Church Claims, p. 65.)

The truth is that one of the greatest disasters to the Philippines has been the destruction of the Roman Catholic churches. The church there is an instrument for the preservation of peace and good order. It is of the utmost governmental importance and should be sustained. I am looking at it purely from a secular standpoint. (Committee on Insular Affairs; hearing, January 7, 1907; Hon. William H. Taft, Secretary of War, p. 6.)

The churches in the islands are very essential to our plans for making the people better and educating them and elevating their moral tone, and therefore the prosperity of all the churches in the islands is very important to the government, and the Roman Catholic Church is one that exists in every village in the islands. * * * Liberality by Congress * * * would be * * * in the interests of the people of the island, not sectarian interest, but interest in favor of morality, of loyalty to the government, of peace and tranquillity in the islands. (Committee on Insular Affairs; hearing, January 20, 1908; Hon. William H. Taft, p. 75.)

I regard the church, outside of the Army, as the greatest single agency for law and order in the Philippine Islands to-day. * * * Another reason is the enormous losses—it is beyond calculation—it runs into the millions—that the Catholic Church has suffered due to our occupation of the Philippine Islands.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH NOT NEARLY COMPENSATED FOR ITS INJURY THROUGH THE WAR.

The Roman Catholic Church in the Philippines has suffered tremendous losses, losses which its revenue there is entirely unable to repair. Commencing with the insurrection in 1896 and continuing through the insurrection of 1898 and the war with Spain, the church suffered tremendous damages and great impairment to its resources. Most of this injury was inflicted, not in the war with Spain, but in the rebellion against the United States, and under such circumstances that no return can ever be made to the church for it. A small proportion, however, comes through the occupancy by the United States troops, and it is that small part for which we are directly responsible that it is the purpose of this bill to repay.

Their work here (referring to the church authorities) has been made hard by the amount of damage that the church has suffered due to the war, and the amount awarded by the board—$363,030.10—will not begin to compensate for the loss inflicted. (Report, Board on Church Claims, p. 65.)

The United States has established a precedent for the payment of these claims as it has paid damages for many other claims of like nature in the United States. Some of these cases are as follows:

$25,000. The Kentucky University at Lexington, Ky.:
For use and occupation of their buildings by United States troops. Forty-first Congress. (16 Stats., 678.)

$18,500. East Tennessee University:
For use of its property. Forty-third Congress. (18 Stats., 604.)

46,080 acres public land. University of Alabama:
For erection of buildings for university, which was destroyed by fire during military occupation April 4, 1865, at Tuscaloosa. Forty-eighth Congress. (23 Stats., 12.)

$18,729.09. Catholic Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, Chattanooga, Tenn.:
For stone and material taken and used by military authorities during civil war. Fiftieth Congress. (25 Stats., 1188.)

$20,000. The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary and High School, Alexandria, Va.:

LOSS OF SACRED ORNAMENTS.

The item of $40,000, for the carrying away of sacred ornaments, should be included in the award as well, as the loss of those ornaments is undoubtedly directly attributable to the use and occupation of the churches by the soldiers. The amount of the award is totally insufficient to compensate the Catholic Church for its losses, and could not put the property back to its original condition, which, at the time the award was made, in 1905, was contemplated.

In the five or six years which have passed since the damage was incurred the condition of the churches has greatly deteriorated. The increase in the price of labor and supplies since the award was made has also rendered it impossible to accomplish as much with a given sum of money as was anticipated.

THE MONEY DUE SHOULD BE PAID DIRECTLY TO THE ROMAN CATHOLIC ARCHBISHOP OF MANILA.

The Roman Catholic Church, it is provided in this bill, should be paid directly the compensation which the measure provides for. Following out the circumstances which led to the damage, the appointment of the board, the justice of its findings, and finally its award, we come to the point, To whom shall it be paid? Sir, I respectfully urge that this payment be made directly to the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Manila, as representing the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church.

The Roman Catholic Church, at the time this property was used by the United States, had the right of possession, disputed by no one. The use and occupation by the troops occurred in the year 1898 and the year immediately following, and the schism in the church which was led by Aglipay did not occur until 1902, or several years after the time for which the rent is asked. The Aglipayan Church itself has recognized this by stating that no claims will be made by it for the rent of the buildings at that time.

(Hearing, Committee on Insular Affairs, January 23, 1908.)

The CHAIRMAN. Has the Independent Catholic Church ever presented a demand for damages to any property mentioned in any of these claims?

Colonel HULL. No, sir; and there is a document on record, secured from Aglipay by an officer whose name I do not now recall, stating that no such claims were contemplated.

THE EXCLUSIVE RIGHT OF POSSESSION DECIDED BY THE COURTS TO BE IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

A question of this importance could not expect to go long without judicial construction, and we already find that the church difficulties in the Philippines have been brought before its courts. In the leading case on this question, the supreme court of the Philippines has decided the exclusive right to the possession of the churches to be in the Roman Catholic Church. In this case, Barlin v. Ramirez (7 Philippine Reports, 41) (which was a case arising on appeal), the supreme court decided that the Roman Catholic Church was entitled to possession as against the claim of the Philipine Independent Church and the municipality, and stated a doctrine which has been followed consistently by that court since. In that opinion, concurred in by all except one of the judges, it is stated that the churches in the Philippines were in the nature of a kind of property the distinctive characteristic of which was that it was devoted to God, and the exclusive possession and administration of which was intrusted to the Roman Catholic Church, and that—

The King of Spain was not the owner of the property in question, nor of any other property like it situated in the Philippine Islands.

Controversies of a similar nature between the local communities and the Catholic Church had arisen in various parts of the islands, and to hasten the disposition of these cases a special act was passed by the Philippine Commission (No. 1376) entitled as follows:

An act providing for the speedy disposition of controversies as to the right of administration or possession of churches, convents, cemeteries, and other church properties, and as to the ownership thereof and title thereto by vesting in the supreme court of the Philippine Islands original jurisdiction to decide such controversies, and for other purposes.

This act set out that—

Whereas controversies have arisen between the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church on the one hand and the association called "The Independent Filipino Church," certain municipalities, and other persons on the other hand, * * * this act is for the purpose of providing that cases involving such controversies may be brought directly to the supreme court of the islands in order to avoid the delay incident to having preliminary trials in the lower court.

Under this act certain additional cases, involving the same facts, have been brought and decisions rendered. That this act is valid an examination of its objects and the cases of our Supreme Court will substantiate beyond a doubt, and the decisions on the cases arising under it establish on a firm basis the theory of the title to the churches in the Philippines. The act itself was passed under the authority given to the Philippine Commission by Congress and as an act of purely local administration will be seen to be absolutely valid. An act passed in Porto Rico for similar purposes gives to their court like powers, and its validity is supported by a recent decision of our Supreme Court. (Kent v. Porto Rico, 207 U. S., 113.)

The general practice of Congress in conferring full power on local assemblies of Territorial districts to legislate on matters of jurisdiction has uniformly been supported by the decisions of our courts. In American Insurance Company v. Canter (1 Peters, 511, p. 543) Chief Justice Marshall says:

The powers of the Territorial legislature extend to all rightful objects of legislation, subject to the restriction, that their laws shall not be "inconsistent with the laws and Constitution of the United States."

It can not be questioned that the provisions of the fourteenth amendment fail to apply to the Philippines, but even if they did, this act is not in objection to them. It merely opens another tribunal for a certain particularly important class of controversies that they may be more speedily and conveniently determined for the public good. The view of the validity of the act from this point of view is supported by United States v. Union Pacific Railroad Company (98 U. S., 569).

The act of July 24, 1905, could in no way affect the value of the decision of Barlin v. Ramirez, as that case had already been commenced and the statute itself was a law when the case was decided. The intention of this act was simply to enable cases involving the church title to be taken directly to the supreme court, and had any other intention existed it certainly would have been brought to the attention of the court and commented on in its decision. The mere fact of permission to commence an action in the supreme court does not, without other words, take away from an inferior court a jurisdiction it already possessed.

The force of the decision, however, does not rest on this one case alone. Since its decision the recent case of Harty v. Tarlac has been decided. The latter case was brought under the act No. 1376, and removes the objection that the decision as to title in Barlin v. Ramirez was but a dictum, in that it takes the language of that decision relative to title and specifically approves it. While the decision as to title may not have been necessary to the disposal of the original case, yet the court, in basing subsequent decisions on these words, gives by these later cases to their doctrine the force of a decision.

This case of Harty v. Tarlac, No. 3212, which is brought by virtue of the provisions of the act No. 1376 for the possession of certain lands by the Roman Catholic Church, decides in that church's favor all the objections as to jurisdiction and affirms the doctrine in Barlin v. Ramirez that the Roman Catholic Church had the ownership of the property. All the objections to the decision of Barlin v. Ramirez urged in the minority report were open to this court to consider, yet the court in deciding for the plaintiff said:

The only question presented is "whether the property in controversy is or is not owned by the government of the Philippine Islands, * * * a question which has been discussed and decided adversely in the case of Barlin v. Ramirez (7 Philippine Reports, 41);" and further says specifically, referring to the same case:

"It was there held that the King of Spain was not the owner of the property involved in those cases, and that the title thereto did not, therefore, pass by the treaty of Paris to the United States. It was further held that the municipalities were not the owners of such property and had no right or interest therein. Applying the principle of those cases to this case, the result is that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for possession as prayed for in the complaint."

And in addition to this latter affirmation, Barlin v. Ramirez and the doctrine of Harty v. Tarlac have been affirmed as well in Roman Catholic Church v. Santos (7 Philippine Reports, 66) and City of Manila v. Roman Catholic Church, decided March 25, 1907.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH A LEGAL ENTITY.

That the Roman Catholic Church is a legal entity with all the rights as such, in every way entitled to hold the church property, a study of the law of the Philippine Islands establishes beyond a doubt. In determining the legal view in the Philippines, the organic law of the islands must be considered. Our courts will always take judicial notice of the Spanish law as far as it affects our insular possessions. (Insular cases, 182 U. S., 1; Hawaii v. Manchichi, 192 U. S., 197; Dorn v. United States, 195 U. S., 138.)

In Artega v. Lara (202 U. S., 339) the present Chief Justice says:

By the general rule of public law, recognized by the United States, whenever political jurisdiction and legislative power over territory are transferred from one nation to another the laws of the country transferred, intended for the protection of private rights, continue in force until abrogated or changed by the new government. Of course, in case of cession to the United States the laws of the ceded country inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States so far as applicable would cease to be of obligatory force, but otherwise the municipal laws of the acquired country continue.

The Roman Catholic Church under all systems of law has been accepted as a legal entity. Since the time of the Emperor Constantine the Roman Catholic Church has been recognized as possessing a legal personality and the capacity to take and acquire property. (The Code of the Emperor Justinian, Book peror Justinian, Book I, Tit. II, Par. I; Tissott, Vol. I, p. 27.)

The personality of the church is here definitely and clearly recognized by the Justinian Code, the basis of all European law, and the Spanish law in its fundamental ideas was taken from the Roman law as set out in this code. In the same manner the English law developed, the early idea being that the saint is the owner of the property, until later the bishop or abbot came to be regarded as the corporate soul. (Pollock & Maitland, 2d ed., Vol. I, p. 499; L. R., 2 Ind. App., 145.)

Commencing from the basis of Justinian and following out the theories of the Spanish and English laws, the American law itself recognizes the corporate entity of churches. Chief Justice Story, in Terett v. Taylor, 9 Cranch., page 43, in deciding that the State of Virginia could not authorize a person to take land granted for a church, said:

It is not in the power of the Crown to seize or assume it; not of the Parliament itself to destroy the grants, unless by the exercise of a power the most arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust and endured only because it could not be resisted.

The Spanish law in the Philippines from the earliest settlement recognized the juristic personality of the church and its right to acquire property. This position has always been recognized by the United States, which up to the time of the loss of the temporal power by the Papacy maintained with it diplomatic relations. (Moore, Digest of International Law, Vol. I, p. 130–131.)

THE TITLE TO THE PROPERTY DOES NOT VEST IN THE TOWNS.

The contention of those who opposed the ownership by the Roman Catholic Church that the title to the property is in the towns is not legally sustainable. The land on which these buildings were erected, whether it originally came from the Crown or from the towns themselves, was donated in most instances centuries ago, and can not now be expropriated. Its donation was for a religious purpose, and the courts will always attempt to carry that out. Because the Spanish Crown, or one of its municipal agencies, chose some centuries ago to donate churches, it can scarcely now be claimed that such a gift is revocable, and that the municipality may now expropriate the property and convert it to any purpose it may desire. The mere fact that because the church may have been originally built by the people the title is in the municipality is without support either in law or in history. The United States Supreme Court said on this point, in the case of Mormon Church v. United States, 136 U. S. 1, 53:

> By the Spanish law, whatever was given to the service of God became incapable of private ownership, being held by the clergy as guardians or trustees; * * * when property was given for a particular object, as a church, a hospital, a convent, or a community, etc., and the object failed, the property did not revert to the donor or his heirs, but devolved to the Crown, the church, or other commune or community, etc.

The public funds employed in church building were appropriated for that purpose without any reservation by the representatives of the nation or by those of the towns. The application of the fund thus appropriated and voted by the legitimate agents of the nations or of the municipalities, constitutes, from the standpoint of law as of justice, a perfect, irrevocable gift. Moreover, this appropriation of public funds in behalf of the church was but a just and proper compensation to which the church was entitled by virtue of her renunciation of the tithes and first fruits in favor of the state and municipalities.

THE ARCHBISHOP CAN ARRANGE FOR THE DISTRIBUTION AMONG THE DIOCESES.

The payment of this money to the archbishop removes from the United States the practically impossible task of determining the distribution among the churches. It will be distributed by him who knows best where the money should be expended to bring the most benefit to the people.

(Testimony before Committee on Insular Affairs January 16, 1908.)

General EDWARDS. Any lump award would be made to the archbishop and he would reconcile the various amounts according to the dioceses under him.

VIEW OF THE MINORITY UNSOUND.

The minority in opposing this measure deny the title of the Roman Catholic Church to the property for which rent is asked. That this denial is mistaken I do not hesitate to affirm, and a consideration of the preceding argument will show the foundation of my grounds in contradicting it.

I believe that the sum of $40,000 should be included, as we have included it, in fairness to the church, and that in making payment directly to the archbishop we are acting for the best interests of the people. The fact that many just claims for the destruction of churches in the United States are awaiting action by Congress can be no argument against this bill. That injustice is being done certain claims can scarcely be urged as ground for denying justice to others equally meritorious.

The bill appropriates an amount determined by a military board after careful consideration. The United States, by all its traditions as well as by the very words in its official papers, holds itself a protector of the church and property, and plainly must pay the owner.

A legal entity, and entitled to hold property from the time of the earliest legal systems, the Roman Catholic Church should be the body to which this award should be paid. [Loud applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, this is an appropriation to provide for payment of the claims of the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands for occupation of and damages to church property by our troops. Damages were assessed by a commission of United States Army officers, and the findings of that board have been approved by the Secretary of War and by the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House. The general principle of payment of these claims is based upon compensation in the form of rent for church buildings and property actually occupied either by the troops of the United States during the military occupation of the islands or when the buildings were used as prisons for the captured Spanish prisoners. Allowance has also been made for church vestments, chalices, and ornaments actually taken, but no allowance is anywhere made for mere damages or destruction purely incidental to warfare as conducted by civilized nations. The sum recommended by the committee to be paid in full settlement of all these claims is $403,030.19. I most earnestly hope that the report of the committee will be adopted.

There are many precedents in the history of our own country for the payment of claims of this nature. In the Southern States church property was occupied by the Federal Army during the war between the States, and claims for rent and occupation were subsequently paid by our Government. This is notably the case in Virginia and in Tennessee, and therefore, in my opinion, it is difficult for gentlemen from those States to assert any opposition on the ground of principle to the present claims before the House. There is no difference in principle. If the payment of damages was right then it is right now. I may add that, inasmuch as the United States in the Philippines has made every effort within its power to pacify those much-vexed islands and to promote good feelings between the inhabitants and the people of the United States, this measure will, in my opinion, go far toward insuring the loyalty of the Filipinos and will be an evidence of that good will which we profess for them.

In the brief time that is allotted to me I can hardly hope to cover all sides of this question. I address myself, therefore, briefly to the question of title. From this legal point of view, it seems to me to have been entirely disposed of by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] in his report of the most recent decision of the Philippine supreme court; but I want to establish the fact that never, so far as I have been able to ascertain, has the title in the Roman Catholic Church to its own church property been challenged before.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] has referred to the independent church established in the Philippines by Aglipay—a former priest, just described upon the floor to-day as a bloodthirsty revolutionist—as "another branch of the Catholic Church," adding that it "differs from that organization only in the fact that it does not acknowledge the control of the Vatican." I can hardly suppose him to be serious in that position, for anybody who has ever looked into the matter at all must know that the backbone of the Catholic faith is absolute and unqualified obedience to the authority of the Vatican, and anybody who does not acquiesce in that can not revolt and thereby set up another branch of the Roman Catholic Church. If he attempts that he goes out of the Roman Catholic Church and loses all right to the name and possessions of that church. However, inasmuch as the schism led by Aglipay occurred in 1902, or three or four years after the damages to church property for which this appropriation makes reparation, the matter can not be said to be of any particular importance or bearing in the premises.

The more interesting subject for discussion is the position taken in the minority report that the legal title to the church property in question is not in the Roman Catholic Church, but is in the municipalities or in the people of the various localities of the Philippine Islands. The reason upon which they base this argument is that these churches were originally built one-third with moneys that came out of the general treasury of Spain, one-third out of local funds, and the remaining one-third from contributions of money or labor made by the members of the church. They therefore maintain that the title to these properties passed by the treaty of Paris to the United States as heir to the King of Spain, and that the United States has the legal title, while the equitable title is in the people of the Philippines for the purposes of worship. In opposition to this argument I submit, first, that the legal title of these church properties never was in the King of Spain, but was always in the Roman Catholic Church, and secondly, that even had the title been in the King of Spain it could never have passed to the United States, because by the very elementary principles of our political existence complete separation of church and state are necessary, and the United States has no constitutional authority to hold church property as trustee for any church.

The right of the Roman Catholic Church to hold title to its own property was established as far back as the time of the Emperor Constantine, in 321 A. D., and confirmed in the Code of Justinian. It has been recognized in all of the jurisprudence of continental Europe. The successful assertion of the Catholic Church during the middle ages to own its own property gave rise in the jurisprudence of England to the whole modern idea of an artificial or corporate personality. It has been confirmed by the Kingdom of Spain in its colonization of the New World, one of the principal objects of such colonization being to Christianize the natives here, and every assistance and aid in the way of money and property was rendered to the church for that purpose. But it has been finally and once and for all confirmed and settled in the Philippine Islands by the concordat between the Pope and the Spanish King in 1851, in which it is said: "The church's 'right of property and everything it now possesses or may hereafter acquire'" is specifically recognized. This was again confirmed in another concordat in 1859, which says:

Especially the Government of His Majesty—

Meaning the King of Spain—

again formally recognizes the full and free right of the church to acquire, retain, and enjoy in full property right and without limitation or reserve all kinds of property and values.

Now, it is true that these church properties were built partly with the money of the King of Spain and partly with the money of the locality, but those gifts were free, without reservation and without restriction, and it is ridiculous at this late day for anyone to assert that such gifts of money or labor or material are subsequently revocable. By agreement at an early date between the Pope and the King of Spain, all ecclesiastical tithes in the Indies were surrendered by the church to the King, and it thereupon became the duty of the Crown to aid in the establishment and maintenance of these churches. It is also ridiculous to assert that the United States, and through them the present Filipino government, could have obtained any right or title to this church property. To make such an assertion, in view of the express language of the concordat, in view of the specific recognition of the church property in the Spanish civil code of the Philippines and their mortgage law—in view, furthermore, of the universal customs of property rights in all civilized nations, is to deny not only the letter of the law but the very facts of history. Our system of government, moreover, specifically forbids the union of church and state, and whatever interest the King of Spain might have had in these church properties was absolved and done away with, and was confirmed to the church itself upon the conclusion of the treaty of Paris.

Cases similar to these have arisen in the courts of the United States—particularly the well-known case of Terrett v. Taylor, in 1815 (9 Cranch., p. 43), which held that the legislature of Virginia could not authorize any persons to take land formerly granted to the Church of England before the Revolution, and the local authorities were restrained from interfering with the church property or claiming title thereto.

Mr. Justice Story said in his opinion:

It was not in the power of the Crown to seize or assume it, nor of the Parliament itself to destroy the grants unless by the exercise of a power the most arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust, and endured only because it could not be resisted. * * * Nor are we able to perceive any sound reason why the church land escheated or devolved upon the State by the Revolution any more than the property of any other corporation created by the royal bounty or established by the legislature.

The very case in point has been adjudicated by the supreme court of the Philippines. In Barlin v. Ramirez, which is discussed in the report of both the majority and minority of the Committee on Insular Affairs, the proposition is clearly established that the title to the church property in the Philippines is in the Roman Catholic Church. The position of the minority as to this case is that the language in the opinion which confirms the Roman Catholic Church in the title to the property under question was merely obiter dictum. I consider that this contention has been entirely disposed of by the recent decision in the case of Harty v. Tarlac, in the supreme court of the Philippines, to which tribunal specific jurisdiction to decide these titles to church property was given by the act of July 24, 1905. This case affirms the words of the court in Barlin v. Ramirez relative to title and makes final disposition of the question. The case of Barlin v. Ramirez has also been affirmed in Roman Catholic Church v. Santos (7 Philippine Reports, p. 66) and in the City of Manila v. Roman Catholic Church, decided March 25, 1907.

I think it is fairly evident, therefore, that the title to these church properties is unquestionable. The teachings of history, the decisions of the courts, and the overwhelming weight of evidence make clear and indisputable the title of the Roman Catholic Church to her own properties. An attempt to cast a cloud over that title is doomed to failure. No other question which has been raised in this debate is of deep significance. The House should therefore vote this appropriation. The dictates of conscience, the promptings of common justice call upon us as representative of the American people to pay these claims. Mr. Chairman, I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] ought to occupy his time now.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I hope that, as I have only eight minutes, gentlemen will not attempt to consume my time by asking me questions. I think I have been already sufficiently liberal in that respect.

I wish to reply briefly to one or two statements made by those who have advocated the payment of this claim. My friend from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has maintained that this claim for $40,000 for vestments is a perfectly proper one. I wish to say to him that his legal mind has undergone a very great change in the last few months. When Secretary Taft was before the Insular Affairs Committee and was being questioned as to these very claims Mr. CRUMPACKER said:

I do not believe that Congress has ever recognized claims of that character. It is one of the incidents of war, and property destroyed incidentally during the activities of war. I do not have in mind an instance where Congress has made any recompense in such a case.

This was the view once taken by the gentleman. [Great laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is not that proposition at all. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I admit the proposition laid down by the gentleman, that the right of possession follows the right of ownership; but I deny the converse of that proposition, that the right of property necessarily follows the possession. This is a very different proposition from that advanced by the gentleman.

Now, the gentleman says that Major McIntyre, of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, said to him that the Independent Philippine Catholic Church had never numbered over a million people. I do not want to drag Major McIntyre into this controversy. He is a gentleman of high character and intelligence, but I discussed this very matter with him this morning, and I will say that he did not intimate to me that it was his opinion that there never were more than a million souls in this church at any one time.

Now, as to these vestments. I stated in my opening remarks that before the board convened by the Secretary of War had made any investigation of this matter that high official issued written instructions to this board as to how they should proceed in ascertaining the amount of damages sustained by the churches. I wish to again read to my friend from Indiana what Secretary Taft said to the board on the subject of payment for the vestments. Here is what Secretary Taft said in his instruction to this board, and I commend it to the gentleman from Indiana:

The seizure, however, of sacred vessels, of sacred vestments, presumed only by their absence at the end of the occupation by the soldiers, I should regard as of very doubtful validity, unless the evidence were direct tending to show that this course was taken by the soldiers and authorized by the officers, and especially are presumptions of this character not to be indulged in where there was previous occupation by the insurgents and where the evidence is not distinct of what the condition of the buildings was when entered and the presence of particular property when the United States entered into occupation. [I do not intend to advise the board to be technical or to be illiberal in estimating damages to property ordinarily incident to occupation by troops who are not particularly careful of the property in which they live, but do wish to advise against the allowance of large damages for the disappearance of particularly valuable vessels or vestments which were probably stolen long before the troops entered into occupation and with respect to which it is to be supposed the church authorities would exercise the utmost care in their preservation before the occupation of the property by the troops.]

It may be inferred from this language that, in Secretary Taft's opinion, it was exceedingly doubtful whether our soldiers ever removed, or even had the opportunity to remove, the vestments for which Congress is now coolly asked to pay $40,000. Colonel Hull's board found no evidence of it, and therefore recommended no payment.

Now, my friend [Mr. OVERSTREET] says that I seem to contend that there ought to be a separate suit in each one of these cases.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the gentleman say that I made that suggestion?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it was the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]. As I have already stated to the committee, the Philippine government, in order to avoid that very thing, prescribed by section 3 of their act how these suits should be brought. I will read section 3:

SEC. 3. It shall not be necessary to file separate petitions against each defendant alleged to be wrongfully in possession of each piece of property as above set forth; but all defendants holding several and distinct pieces of property in the same province may be embraced in one petition.

I stated this in my opening remarks, and still my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] maintains that I contended it was necessary to bring a separate suit in each case. What I contend is that it is the duty of the people who claim this property to pursue the course laid down by the Philippine government in order to establish their rights, and to do that they are not driven to bring a number of different suits. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] says, with great dramatic effect, that there is not a single suit pending in the Philippine Islands involving the title to this property. That is the very contention which I have always made. There has never been one decided, and the government there has gone to the pains of providing a court and of prescribing the method of procedure, and yet these claimants who are asking Congress to recognize their title to this valuable property have never dared to present their case in the supreme court. No; there is no case pending there. They are appealing to Congress; they are appealing to you, gentlemen, and not to the tribunal the decision of which Secretary Taft said they must await—the court specifically provided by the Philippine government under authority of the Congress of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is about all I wish to say on this subject. When the bill comes up for consideration under the five-minute rule I shall move to strike out the $40,000 incorporated for the payment for vestments, because Secretary Taft himself seems to have regarded all claims of that nature of very doubtful validity and because the Hull board rejected them as not supported by testimony.

Mr. BURLESON. What do you have to say in answer to the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] with reference to the concordat between the King of Spain and the Pope of Rome?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I discussed that at length in my opening argument, and I alone discussed it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN].

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Chairman, in support of the majority report in favor of H. R. 16143, to provide for payment of claims of the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands, I do not suppose that it is necessary to spend much time in demonstrating the justness of the conclusion of the committee that there should be paid to the Archbishop of Manila, in the Philippine Islands, as the representative and trustee of the Roman Catholic Church in said islands, the sum of $403,030.19, in full satisfaction of all claims for use and occupation of the property of said church in said islands and for damages done thereto by the military forces of the United States prior to January 15, 1906. I now wish to address myself principally to the contentions contained in the minority report presented by Mr. JONES of Virginia, of which the following is, I think, a fair summary:

1. That as to where the title to the church property resides and as to who in justice and equity is entitled to its occupancy and use for religious purposes, it would be premature and improper at this time to express an opinion.
2. The disputed claim to the ownership as well as to the occupancy and possession of this property should be settled before any question as to the liability of the United States for damages done to it can be passed upon by Congress.
3. Until it is decided by the supreme court of the Philippine Islands to whom this property belongs it is manifestly improper for Congress to pass this bill.
4. That the case of Barlin v. Ramirez determined the right of possession of and not the title to the property involved.
5. If the title to the church property is in the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church, the recommendation of the majority report that Congress shall pay to the Archbishop of Manila $403,030.19 in settlement of the claims of the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church can not be justified.
6. This sum should not be paid to the Archbishop of Manila, for he has no power to execute a proper acquittance therefor.
7. Hundreds of claims for the use and occupation of Catholic and Protestant churches in the United States have been waiting the pleasure of Congress for more than a third of a century. Are they less meritorious than these church claims, the payment of which is now being so strenuously urged?

My first proposition is that the title to the church property referred to is in the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church and that the representative of that church is entitled to receive the sum of money provided in the bill for the purpose specified.

The corporate entity of the church and its power to acquire property is recognized as early as 321 A. D. in the Code of Justinian, the law of the Emperor Constantine. There is in the code the strictest prohibition against alienating the property of the church and the ordinary rules of prescription did not run against the church. The church was constantly recognized by the emperors in its corporate capacity. All the fundamental ideas of the Spanish law were taken from the Roman law.

The following quotation from the Partidas, the fundamental code of ancient Spanish law, compiled by Alfonzo the Wise (1252 A. D.), indicates how well recognized was the right of the churches to take and hold property:

[Translation.]

And, in addition, the churches have other privileges: That as to the estates which have been given or sold or left to them lawfully by will, even if they have not received possession of them, they get the title and right which has been given or sold or left to them, so that they can demand them for their own against whomsoever may hold them.

By the first article of the concordat of March 16, 1851, it is provided:

That the Catholic apostolic religion, to the exclusion of any other religion whatever, shall continue to be the sole religion of the Spanish nation and will always be preserved in the domains of His Catholic Majesty with all the rights and privileges which it ought to enjoy, according to the law of God and the provisions of its sacred canons.

And article 41 specifically recognizes the church's "right of property in everything it now possesses or may hereafter acquire."

In accordance with the terms of the concordat, down to the occupation by the American troops in August, 1898, amounts were regularly appropriated by the Spanish Government for the expenses of worship in Spain, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines.

At the date of the American military occupation no one questioned the legal ownership and possession by the church of all the property occupied by her.

In reply to the proposition that the Roman Catholic Church had no legal personality in the Philippine Islands, the court said, in Barlin v. Ramirez (Vol. VII, Philippine Reports, pp. 57–58):

It is suggested by the appellant that the Roman Catholic Church has no legal personality in the Philippine Islands. This suggestion, made with reference to an institution which antedates by almost a thousand years any other personality in Europe, and which existed "when Grecian eloquence still flourished in Antioch, and when idols were still worshiped in the temple of Mecca," does not require serious consideration.

Secretary Taft has said in referring to the Philippines:

The transfer of sovereignty and all governmental property rights and interests from the Crown of Spain to the United States in the Philippine Islands contained in the treaty of Paris was a transfer from a Government between which and the Church of Rome there had been in those islands the closest associations in property, religion, and politics, to a Government which by the law of its being is absolutely prevented from having such associations with any church. To make the transfer effectual, and at the same time just, it is obvious that the proper line of division must be drawn between what were really civil property interest of the Crown of Spain and what were religious trusts of the Catholic Church.

The claim made in behalf of the Independent Filipino Church, that because the churches may have been built by the people of the municipalities the title is in the municipality, is controverted in a case in our Supreme Court, in which it was held that—

By the Spanish law, whatever was given to the service of God became incapable of private ownership, being held by the clergy as guardians or trustees; * * * when property was given for a particular object, as a church, a hospital, a convent, or a community, etc., and the object failed, the property did not revert to the donor, or his heirs, but devolved to the Crown, the church, or other commune or community, etc. (Mormon Church v. U. S., 136 U. S., 1, 53.)

It appears, to quote from the majority report on this bill, that—

From the time that the American Army landed in the Philippines, in the year 1898, until the complete return of peace in the islands, the Government of the United States, through its military forces, took possession of churches, contiguous parish houses, school buildings, seminary buildings, etc., and used them as hospitals, prisons, or barracks. After the cessation of hostilities in many instances the occupation of the buildings had to be continued until suitable quarters could be constructed for the garrisons which remained in the archipelago, the entire time of the occupancy varying in individual cases from a few weeks to two years or more. The occupation by the Government wholly excluded the church authorities, preventing them from taking any measures for the protection of the property. Many of the buildings so occupied were fine structures. For example, the cathedral at Manila, a large stone building with high walls and a dome, and possessing an interior ornamented by handsome woodwork, was used at one time to imprison between 3,000 and 4,000 Spanish soldiers. Buildings thus seized and occupied were often seriously damaged, sometimes partially or wholly destroyed.

The claims for compensation for occupation of and damages to this property were considered by a board of officers called "the board on church claims," appointed under a special order of the War Department, of which Lieut. Col. John A. Hull, judge-advocate, was chairman. The award of the board carefully excluded compensation for damages done by the insurgents, for damages incident to military operations, for wanton damages by soldiers of the American Army, and for use and occupancy and damages by servants of the civil government.

The only claimant that ever asked for compensation for damages to the property was the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands. Bearing upon the question of title to this church property, Secretary Taft, in his letter written on the transport Logan, September 2, 1905, to Maj. Gen. Henry C. Corbin, commanding general Philippines division at Manila, expresses the following opinion:

Personally, after having looked somewhat into this matter of title, I have no doubt whatever that the cathedral and the various archbishops' palaces belong to the Roman Catholic Church. It is true they were constructed partly out of funds furnished by the Spanish Government and on land belonging to the Government, but they were constructed in accordance with the concordat in which the Spanish Government agreed to furnish the churches and other ecclesiastical buildings used for ecclesiastical purposes, and by the very act of construction and of delivery to the church authorities the title in equity passed, whether what we would call legal title passed or not. For that reason I think the rents for such buildings and the damages in use and occupation ought to be paid by the Government of the United States to the Roman Catholic Church, and the board reporting, in cases where doubt arises, that such doubt exists, should nevertheless include in their award the amounts for the rent of such buildings and for damages in use and occupation.

In order, however, that the matter might be judicially determined, an act was passed July 24, 1905, giving to the supreme court of the Philippine Islands original jurisdiction to determine all actions which involved controversies between the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church and its representatives on the one hand, and the Independent Filipino Church and its representatives or any municipality or other person on the other hand, as to the title to any and all churches, convents, or seminaries in the Philippine Islands, and real and personal property used in connection therewith, or as to the ownership, right of administration, or possession thereof.

Prior to the passage of this act a suit had been brought in the court of the first instance of the islands, entitled "Barlin v. Ramirez." It appeared that Ramirez, who originally had been put in possession of a church building by the Roman Catholic Church in the town of Lagonoy, had severed his connection with the Pope at Rome and had joined the Independent Filipino Church, so called, taking his church with him; and it was to get possession of the church that this suit was brought by the legal representatives of the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church in that diocese. Much stress is laid in the minority report upon the alleged fact that the right to the possession of this particular property was the only question involved in the suit, and that the question of title and ownership of the property was not passed upon. However this may be, it remains that the majority opinion of the court maintained, among others, the following propositions:

As a matter of law, the Spanish Government at the time the treaty of peace was signed was not the owner of this property, nor of any other property like it situated in the Philippine Islands.

The truth is that from the earliest times down to the cession of the Philippines to the United States churches and other consecrated objects were considered outside of the commerce of man. They were not public property; nor could they be subjects of private property in the sense that any private person could be the owner thereof. They constituted a kind of property the distinctive characteristic of which was that it was devoted to the worship of God.

The possession of the churches, their care and custody, and the maintenance of religious worship therein were necessarily, therefore, intrusted to that body—the Roman Catholic Church. It was, by virtue of the laws of Spain, the only body which could under any circumstances have possession of or any control over any church dedicated to the worship of God. By virtue of those laws this possession and right of control were necessarily exclusive. It is not necessary or important to give any name to this right of possession and control exercised by the Roman Catholic Church in the church buildings of the Philippines prior to 1898. It is not necessary to show that the church, as a judicial person, was owner of the buildings. It is sufficient to say that this right to the exclusive possession and control of the same for the purposes of its creation existed.

It therefore follows that in 1898, and prior to the treaty of Paris, the Roman Catholic Church had by law the exclusive right to the possession of this church, and it had the legal right to administer the same for the purposes for which the building was consecrated. It was then in the full and peaceful possession of the church, with the rights aforesaid. That these rights were fully protected by the treaty of Paris is very clear. That treaty, in article 8, provides, among other things, as follows:

"And it is hereby declared that the relinquishment or cession, as the case may be, to which the preceding paragraph refers, can not in any respect impair the property or rights which by law belong to the peaceful possession of property of all kinds, of provinces, municipalities, public or private establishments, ecclesiastical or civic bodies, or any other associations having legal capacity to acquire and possess property in the aforesaid territories renounced or ceded, or of private individuals, of whatsoever nationality such individuals may be."

This opinion would seem to establish fully the proposition that the right of possession and control exercised by the Roman Catholic Church prior to 1898 was complete. Indeed, the Independent Filipino Church, so called, is in no position to assert any title to these properties during the period covered by the investigation of the military board, for the reason that the Independent Filipino Church was not then in existence, it appearing from the record that the Independent Church did not come into existence until after that time.

I may perhaps digress at this point for a moment to explain that Don Gregorio Aglipay, obispo maximo of the Independent Filipino Church, was ordained priest in the Catholic Church in 1890. He took no part in the uprising against Spain in 1896, and continued in his work until Admiral Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet May 1, 1898. It appears upon his own statement that Aglipay was urged to go to the Filipino insurgents, who were cooperating with the American soldiers. Aglipay was to offer independence to the Filipinos, and persuade them to renounce their allegiance to the American cause. This mission failed. Subsequently Aglipay was excommunicated. He took up arms against the American forces, and for several years continued in revolt. Finally he surrendered and took the oath of allegiance to the United States. He is the head of the Independent Filipino Church, which does not acknowledge the control of the Vatican, but observes all the rites, ceremonies, etc., of the Church of Rome, and in behalf of the church has made the claim that the churches were built by the Government of Spain with money obtained from the taxation of the people, that the churches and convents were the property of the Crown of Spain, and that this ownership passed to the United States by the treaty of Paris, and that the Independent Church has the right to use the church property where it is in possession.

Returning now to the proposition advanced by the minority as to the ownership of this church property, attention is called to two recent cases in which this exact question is involved.

In the first case, No. 3212, decided December 28, 1907, which is an original action brought in the supreme court of the Philippine Islands by virtue of the provisions of act No. 1376, the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church is one of the plaintiffs, certain municipalities mentioned, and Don Gregorio Aglipay, obispo maximo of the Independent Church, are among the defendants, and from this opinion I make the following quotation:

It is further adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff, the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church, is entitled to the immediate possession of the following-described property situated in the municipality of Tarlac, Province of Tarlac, to wit: The grounds of the old church of La Paz, known as the grounds of the old church and convent of La Paz; the grounds of the old cemetery of La Paz, known as the old cemetery of La Paz, and the new cemetery of La Paz, known as the new cemetery of La Paz, and that neither the municipality of Tarlac nor the defendant, Gregorio Aglipay, obispo maximo of the Independent Filipino Church, has any right, title, or interest therein.

It is further adjudged and decreed that the property last hereinbefore mentioned be returned to the plaintiffs, and that the said defendants be ousted from the possession thereof, and that such possession be awarded to the plaintiffs.

It is further adjudged and decreed that a writ of possession issue out of this court against the defendants, the municipality of Tarlac and Gregorio Aglipay, obispo maximo of the Independent Filipino Church, in the manner and form prescribed by act No. 190.

In a second case, No. 3133, decided January 2, 1908, in which the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church et al. are plaintiffs, and certain municipalities and Gregorio. Aglipay are defendants, the earlier decisions are followed, and it is held, among other things, as follows:

And it is further adjudged and decreed that a writ of possession issue out of this court against the defendant, Gregorio Aglipay, obispo maximo of the Independent Filipino Church, in the manner and form prescribed in act No. 190, for the recovery of the church, cemetery, and convent hereinbefore described as situated in the municipality of Cuyapo, and against the municipality of Cuyapo for the recovery of the possession of the convent in said municipality hereinbefore described; and against Gregorio Aglipay, obispo maximo of the Independent Filipino Church, and the municipality of Aliaga, for the recovery of the church and cemetery of Zaragoza; and against Gregorio Aglipay, obispo maximo of the Independent Filipino Church, and the municipality of Talavera, for the recovery of the cemetery in Talavera.

So that it would appear to be settled beyond doubt that the title to these properties is in the Roman Catholic Apostolic Church.

There can be no doubt but that the award made by the board is a conservative one. An examination of the cases (pp. 11 to 42 of the report) will demonstrate the care with which they were considered, each by itself.

The board acted under instructions from the Secretary of War contained in his letter written on the transport Logan, September 2, 1905. The total amount claimed was $2,442,963.13, and the total amount awarded was $363,030.19. Fifty-nine of the cases were reported upon adversely.

Of the $363,030.19 awarded, speaking in round numbers, $306,878 was for rent, and $56,151 was for damages. In addition to this the committee allowed $40,000 for the spoliation and carrying away of sacred ornaments, images, vestments, etc., making the total amount of the award the sum carried in the bill $403,030.19. The amount claimed for the articles of cult and ornamentation was $298,222.50.

In speaking of this item the board says in its report:

If Congress should in its liberality desire to compensate the church for the spoliation and carrying away of sacred ornaments, images, vestments, etc., we recommend that the sum of $40,000 be paid, as, in the opinion of the board, this sum will be fully ample.

That this award is a conservative one will be demonstrated by a reading of the testimony. Upon this point Colonel Hull says:

I probably have a more intimate knowledge of these claims than any other one man. I have gone over them all, and I know them intimately. I am confident that $500,000 would not be an excessive award at this time. * * * Prices have increased wonderfully from the time that I first went to the Philippines, in 1899, and I have no doubt that this has continued to go on. Five hundred thousand dollars to-day would not do any more than $363,000 would two years ago. It would do about the same.

And it should be borne in mind that the award of the board was based not on conditions at the time it was made, 1905–6, but upon conditions at the time covered by the claim—1898–1902. Upon this same point Secretary Taft in his testimony stated:

I recommended, when it was here before, that this amount of $363,000 might well be increased to $500,000 or more on general principles of equity, and I have not changed my views on that subject at all, especially in view of the last reports. I think that $363,000 is much too low for rent and damages in occupation by our troops. It is much too low, because of the difficulty of bringing in evidence so long after the event. I think the board went through the matter with great care. But there are a great many claims filed in excess of the $363,000 that, nearer to the event, might have been proven. The burden, of course, was on the claimants; but, with the immense loss that the church suffered from war and other causes, I am quite sure that the increase of $363,000 to half a million dollars or more will be no injustice. I am speaking now of the church claims, and not the friars' claims, which are a separate matter.

And in another part of his testimony said:

My recollection is that I recommended to double the $363,000. What I thought was, that, in view of the circumstances, there ought to be an equitable allowance in addition to the exact legal finding which was made.

It should also be borne in mind that since the damage to the property occurred much deterioration has taken place. Upon this point Right Rev. Frederick L. Rooker, now deceased, made the following statement before the board December 5, 1906:

Even if the Government were to grant the claims of this diocese just as they stand, the condition of the church here would still remain very much deteriorated in comparison with what it was before the war. The sums asked for would be insufficient to put the property back to its original condition. These amounts are calculated on the basis of damages actually done. Since then, as time has passed, the deterioration to the damaged buildings has increased month by month. This subsequent deterioration has not been included in the claims which have been presented. The repairs to-day would be much more than at time of damage. For example, if the claim made for damages in the parish of Maasin (case 369) amounting to ₱2,000, had been paid at the time they were made the amount would have restored the property to its original condition; to-day that restoration would cost not less than ₱10,000.

In view of these facts the sum named in the bill can not be regarded as too large. Indeed, it might well be made larger.

The suggestion made in the minority report that because perchance Congress has been dilatory in recognizing claims of our own people this claim should be disregarded is hardly worthy of serious consideration. This obligation should be promptly met in justice to ourselves, to the church, and to the Filipino people, among whom the church is so potent an influence for good. Upon this point the board said in its report:

The church authorities as at present constituted are our friends and helpers in the establishment and preservation of law and order in these islands and are upholders of the authority of the United States. Their work here has been made hard by the amount of damage that the church has suffered due to war, and the amount awarded by the board, viz, $363,030.19, will not begin to compensate for the loss so inflicted. This amount, however, is justly due from the United States and is most urgently needed by the church in its work here.

And Secretary Taft said in his testimony before the committee in January last:

Now, I am not as familiar with the recent evidence taken as doubtless some of the members of the committee are, and certainly not as familiar with it as Colonel Hull is, and I can only say generally, as I said before, that the condition of the Roman Catholic Church in the islands is deplorable, because of the destruction of these buildings and because of the absence of money with which to conduct the church. Under the concordat the Spanish Government paid the priests and paid most of the expenses of conducting the church and furnished the buildings and the land. Now, by reason of the separation of church and state, due to the transfer of sovereignty, the money to administer the church has to come either from the outside or from the people; and it is a very difficult thing to go from one system, where the Government supports the church, to the other, where the church is supported by voluntary contributions. The churches in the islands are very essential to our plans for making the people better and educating them and elevating their moral tone, and therefore the prosperity of all the churches in the islands is very important to the Government, and the Roman Catholic Church is the one that exists in every village in the islands. Therefore I always thought, in dealing with the church, that liberality toward it was liberality toward the Government and the people themselves; and liberality by Congress in recognizing the equity of these claims, and thus assisting the church, would be, it seems to me, in the interest of the people of the islands; not sectarian interest, but an interest in favor of morality, of loyalty to the Government, of peace and tranquillity in the islands.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR].

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration carries an appropriation of $403,030.19 to be paid to the Archbishop of Manila, in the Philippine Islands as the legal representative of the Roman Catholic Church, in full satisfaction of all claims for use and occupation of the property of said church and damages done thereto by the military forces of the United States during the war with Spain.

It seems to me, after listening to debate upon this bill for two hours, that the sole question to determine is, whether or not the appropriation of this sum is a fair and equitable adjustment of the claim made by the Roman Catholic Church of the islands for the use of their property by the United States army, and for damages sustained incident to such occupation. I want to say in the beginning, Mr. Chairman, that I believe the amount appropriated is justly due the church, and I shall vote for the passage of the bill. It is not denied that the property of the church was used by the United States army for barracks and for sheltering troops. The churches were the only buildings in the towns suitable for the purpose, and our military forces made use of them. Anyone who has even limited knowledge of military affairs knows that such use made of a church would result in great damage. In some instances attacks were made on American forces, while occupying one of the churches, and the building practically destroyed. Many were almost entirely destroyed, while others were greatly damaged.

The bill comes before us in the way of a majority report from the Committee on Insular Affairs, recommending the payment of the amount specified in the bill, while a minority of the committee report against the payment of the claim, upon the theory that only $363,000 of the claim was proven to be due and that $40,000 is for property carried away and destroyed, for which the United States Government is not liable. It is contended by the minority that there is no precedent for the payment of a claim for ornaments and personal property stolen and destroyed during our occupation. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman, I care nothing about precedent. I am more interested in justice, and I am satisfied from the evidence in this case that $40,000 is a small sum to cover this item, and I doubt if the property could be replaced for double this amount.

It is also contended in the minority report that the Archbishop of Manila is not the proper person to whom this claim should be paid. It is claimed that during the war there was a division of the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands and that that division still exists; hence there is a question as to whom this money should be paid. I have gone through both reports carefully and have read the decision of the courts touching upon this question, and I am satisfied that the position taken by the majority is a correct one and that this money should be paid as directed by the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to consider for a few moments the merit of this claim and the method employed in reaching a decision as to what was really due. When our troops landed in the Philippine Islands in 1898 they took possession of churches, schoolhouses, parish houses, and other buildings belonging to the Roman Catholic Church and used them for barracks, hospitals, and prisons. Some of them were very excellent buildings, notable in architecture and interior adornment. They were used during the war with Spain, and after hostilities ceased our occupancy continued until suitable quarters could be erected for our army which remained on the islands. During our occupation the authorities of the church had no possible opportunity of protecting the buildings or taking care of their furnishings. Hence many of the buildings were entirely destroyed, while others were greatly damaged, and personal property was either destroyed or carried away. The authorities of the Catholic Church on the islands presented a claim to the United States Government for use, rental, and damages to property, and the War Department issued an order creating a board authorized to make an investigation and report. This board was appointed and consisted of Lieut. Col. J. A. Hull, judge-advocate; Lieut. Col. Alexander O. Brodie, military secretary, and First Lieut. J. W. Moore, Second Cavalry, all of the United States Army. This board met at the headquarters of the Philippine Division, in the city of Manila, on the 1st day of August, 1905, and took up the investigation of the claim. The report of this board shows that they made a very careful examination of all damaged property, and that their findings were made after a conscientious, intelligent, and thorough investigation lasting for about six months.

The claims filed by the Catholic Church for rent, damages, and personal property carried away amounted to $2,442,963.13. After a painstaking examination the board found that there was due the church for rental and damages to buildings the sum of $363,030.19. It was also claimed by the church that a loss had been sustained for articles of cult and ornamentation amounting to the sum of $298,222.50, but the board, after making a thorough investigation of this claim, directed that a larger amount than $40,000 would be excessive, so the bill now before us carries an appropriation of $403,030.19 to cover these two items. That the Catholic Church in the Philippines suffered tremendous losses no one will deny, and it seems to me there should be no hesitancy in passing this bill. The justice in so doing is emphasized by the position the United States has always taken in official documents touching upon such questions. An investigation will disclose the fact that the United States has at all times declared it a duty and responsibility resting upon the Government to protect and care for church and personal property under such conditions, and we can not now afford to repudiate that position.

The articles of capitulation of the city of Manila, dated August 14, 1898, signed by representatives of General Merritt's army and of the Spanish army, provide:

ART. 7. This city, its inhabitants, its churches and religious worship, its educational establishments, and its private property of all descriptions are placed under the special safeguard of the faith and honor of the American army.

It is generally understood these provisions were made a part of the articles upon the order of President McKinley and bound the United States to protect church property against damage during its occupancy by the American army. When General Merritt, in command of the United States forces, entered the city of Manila, he issued a proclamation, paragraph 6 of which is based on article 7 of the articles of capitulation, and reads as follows:

All churches and places devoted to religious worship and to the arts and sciences, all educational institutions, libraries, scientific collections, and museums are, so far as possible, to be protected; and all destruction or intentional defacement of such places or property, of historical monuments, archives, or works of science and art is prohibited, save when required by urgent military necessity. Severe punishment will be meted out for all violations of this regulation.

After the war was over the treaty of Paris was agreed to and signed December 10, 1898, ceding to the United States the Philippine Islands. In that document the rights of the two nations were fully set out, and paragraph 8 reads as follows:

And it is hereby provided that the relinquishment or cession, as the case may be, to which the preceding paragraph refers, can not in any respect impair the property or rights which by law belong to the peaceful possession of property of all kinds, of provinces, municipalities, public or private establishments, ecclesiastical or civic bodies, or any other associations having legal capacity to acquire and possess property in the aforesaid territories, renounced or ceded, or of private individuals, of whatsoever nationality such individuals may be.

In all these documents it will be observed that the mention of private property is always followed by a mention of church property, which is placed under the protection of the United States Government, and in considering a claim of this character it is well to remember the position our Government has placed itself in with reference to such claims. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is a very meritorious claim, and its payment should not be delayed a day longer. The destruction and damage to the property belonging to the Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands was unfortunate, not only for the church but for our Government as well.

The authorities of the church have contributed much toward the establishment and preservation of law and order on the islands and have rendered valuable service in upholding the authority of the United States. The payment of this claim will enable the Catholic Church to rebuild and repair destroyed property over the islands and furnish the people a place to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience. While I am not a member of that creed, I recognize its power as a christianizing force in the Philippine Islands, and what it has accomplished in the way of raising the standard of life and the development of higher ideals of Christian character among the Filipinos has attracted the attention and won the admiration of all mankind. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, we underestimate the influence for good exerted by churches of all denominations. Let us not forget that the great advancement of our nation and the rapid progress we have made as a people are due to the fact that we are a Christian nation, made so through the influence and work of the various denominations of the church. [Applause.] Christianity destroys the walls that separate class from class and nation from nation.

It drives out hatred, envy, malice, and jealousy; it calls in love, charity, benevolence, and humanity. If all men were Christian men, if all nations were Christian nations, what a splendid world this would be. The dark clouds of jealousy, bitterness, contention, and war that sometimes hover over the nations of the earth would be carried away on the wings of peace, and all differences arising between nations would be settled on Christian principles by Christian people. [Applause.] Then, my friends, let us use our power and influence in building up and maintaining churches of all denominations, that the image of God may be stamped on every soul, and that the people, the world over, may unite in the elevation and betterment of human beings everywhere. [Applause.]

I am in favor of the passage of this bill because it is a just debt, found to be such after a thorough investigation made by a board appointed by the Government. I hope the day will soon come when the people of the Philippine Islands will be given their independence, and I believe that day will be hastened by the passage of this bill, which will enable the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands to rebuild and repair their places of worship in order that they may carry on their work of educating the people up to American ideals and the upholding of our institutions. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I now yield, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] in his closing remarks quoted a statement which I was supposed to have made before the Committee on Insular Affairs in relation to the law as to the allowance of a certain class of claims. The opinion I expressed there had no reference whatever to this particular class of claims. It had no reference whatever to the claim for damages for sacred ornaments and vestments that were destroyed or carried away by the American soldiers while the church property was in the possession of the United States soldiers. The observation I made at that time was that the general rule of law was that wanton damage to or destruction of property in a time of war as one of the incidents of war was not a legal claim against the Government. It had no sort of reference to this claim and involved altogether a different principle. The gentleman from Virginia ought not to have read that record without giving me the opportunity to explain it then and there.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I think I gave the gentleman full warning.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman gave me warning that he would not allow me to interrupt him when I wanted to explain. I think it was hardly fair to me.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCDERMOTT].

Mr. MCDERMOTT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill, as I understand it, is to reimburse the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands for actual damage that was done to its property by our soldiers and sailors during the war with Spain. It is a matter of history that during that war our armies in the Philippines used the church buildings owned by the Catholic Church for barracks and for the sheltering of troops. The churches were the only buildings there that were suited for this purpose, and our soldiers and sailors promptly made use of them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, anyone knows that when a church or any other building is used for this purpose it results in great damage to the church. This occupation, so we are informed, left some of the churches in a state of ruin. Doors and windows were torn off, and some of the ornaments and decorations, many of which were very costly and so rare that it will be impossible to replace them, were carried away. On some occasions the soldiers were attacked by the enemy while they were thus quartered in these churches, and before the fighting was over many of the churches were shot to pieces.

The officers of the Catholic Church had no use whatever of their buildings while our Army was in the Philippines. These churches, being the biggest and best buildings to be found, were immediately seized by the soldiers and converted into barracks, hospitals, arsenals, and the like. Even the schools and convents were appropriated, so that the church officers, including the priests and the sisters in the convents, were driven into the streets, homeless and without shelter of any kind. Many of the priests died from exposure and from the hardships caused by having their homes taken away from them.

Immediately after the war was over the church put in a claim for more than $2,000,000 against the United States Government, and, after wrestling with a good many points of law, a commission finally was appointed to investigate the claims and to get to the bottom of the controversy. This commission met in Manila in 1905, and after a long session and the taking of evidence from thousands of reliable persons, it decided that while the church was not entitled to the amount claimed, it should be paid at least a part of the money for which it asked. This commission, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, did not report as favorably as it should have done. At the time of the war the Roman Catholic Church had property scattered all over the islands. Hundreds of schools and parish houses and churches had been built and cared for for centuries, and these, every one of them, were more or less damaged by the soldiers.

The commission reported that the sum of $40,000 should be paid for the loss of ornaments and decorations that were taken from the church. This amount is shamefully small. In some of those churches, so I am told, were pictures and statues that were hundreds of years old. To the church they were so valuable that no amount of money could have bought them. They represented traditions and had the value of heirlooms. To an outsider, perhaps, they would not seem valuable, but to those who had collected them and who had guarded them and watched over them for years and years they were of immense value. The amount that is proposed to pay for the loss of these things is nowhere near to what it should be.

Some of the members of the committee that has been considering these church claims were opposed to the payment of such a large amount as that asked for by the church authorities. They argued, in the first place, that the Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands had no legal existence, and that it was part of the state of Spain. But this is not good logic. The Catholic Church has had a legal existence since the days of Galieno. He was the first of the Roman Emperors to grant the church a standing as a legal entity and to declare that it had property rights before the laws of the Empire. Before the Commission that was appointed to investigate the claims that were made by the church against the Government of the United States it was conclusively shown that the church existed as a separate institution in the Philippine Islands, and that, while it wielded a certain political influence, its property rights were distinctively its own.

In the treaty that was signed at Paris ending the conflict between the United States and Spain there was recognition of the legal rights of the church. Paragraph 8 of that document reads as follows:

And it is hereby provided, That the relinquishment or cession, as the case may be, to which the preceding paragraph refers, can not in any respect impair the property or rights which by law belong to the peaceful possession of property of all kinds, or provinces, municipalities, public or private establishments, ecclesiastical or civic bodies, or any other associations having legal capacity to acquire and possess property in the aforesaid territories renounced or ceded, or by private individuals, of whatsoever nationality such individuals may be.

It will be observed that the church is recognized in this document as a body having legal and separate existence. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I think it has been pretty well established on the floor here to-day that the Catholic Church in the Philippines has legal rights there, and that the United States Government is not only morally but legally bound to observe these rights.

Mr. Chairman, the Catholic Church is a great pioneer. Wherever there has been civilization there you will find the Catholic Church. In the whole history of the world it will be found that it generally was the bold and adventurous spirit of the Roman Catholic Church that led to discoveries and the opening to civilization of new and unknown continents. It was Columbus, a Roman Catholic, who pushed through the strange waters of the fierce Atlantic to the New America, and it was De Soto, another Roman Catholic, who broke the first pathway through the tangled wilderness of the South until he reached the Mississippi. The traditions of our own country are interwoven with the noble accomplishments of Roman Catholics. From the very first this church has had its imprint on our progress, and its influence always has been for the good. From the early Jesuit missionaries, who lived in their rude cabins of the North that the savage minds of the western Indians might be ventilated with the light of knowledge, to that noble priest in Denver who so recently was shot down by a wild anarchist has the Catholic influence been felt in this country.

And so it has been in all the countries of the world, and so, also, in the Philippines. Centuries before the nation of which we in this House have the honor to be sons was dreamed of those Catholic priests were at work there in the Philippines, building their churches, spreading their civilization, and preparing the islands for that civilization which we some day hope to give them.

Mr. Chairman, I have read both the majority and the minority report of the Committee on Insular Affairs, before which these claims have been pending, and I can reach but one conclusion, which is: To vote for the majority report. I believe this report is fair and just and that it offers none too much compensation for the many losses and hardships that the Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands had to put up with, and I say we ought to pay the claims of these honest men who stand in the vanguard of our civilization, breaking down the barriers of idolatry and paving the way for the new light of Christianty. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in this connection Senate Document No. 11, a message from the President, recommending the payment of these claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to print Senate Document No. 11, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I herewith submit to the Congress the report of the Secretary of War and of the Judge-Advocate-General in reference to the claims presented by the representatives of the Roman Catholic Church for amounts due from the United States to the various Roman Catholic churches in the islands for use and occupation by troops of the United States, and for damages during such occupation. I cordially indorse all that is said in these reports, and earnestly hope that the amount recommended by the board will be immediately appropriated, in order to do what is really an act of substantial justice to the Roman Catholic churches of the Philippines, in accordance with the suggestion of the Secretary of War. It is not only a matter of equity that we should pay this sum, but for the reasons set forth by the Secretary of War it is very greatly to the interest of the people of the Philippine Islands that it should be paid. I have accordingly approved the action of the Secretary of War in directing that the same board be reconvened, or another convened, to report on the advisability of paying additional sums to the Roman Catholic churches in the islands in view of the damages inflicted upon them by reason of the war and by the insurrectos. I feel that this is peculiarly a case where in the interest of the Philippine people themselves it would be wise for the Congress to exercise a large liberality.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 5, 1906.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "four hundred and three thousand and thirty dollars and thirteen cents" and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, from the discussion that has been had here to-day and a careful perusal of this report, that the award made by the board excluded all damages done by the insurgents, all damages incident to military occupation, for wanton damages by the soldiers of the American army, for the use and occupancy of the servants of the civil government, and, further, it appears on page 3 of the report that it was the testimony of Colonel Hull and the Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, that $500,000 would be a very conservative sum for the amount of damages sustained. Now, it appears that the committee took not into consideration the deterioration resulting from the damages done. You will observe that these buildings were damaged and afterwards various causes of destructioned supervened and much deterioration of the buildings occurred, so that $57,000 of the amount given for damages was inadequate. As stated by the chairman, Mr. COOPER, $306,000 was given for rent and occupancy and only the sum of $57,000 for deterioration and damages—or rather nothing for deterioration, but $57,000 for actual damage done.

The award is several years after the damages were done, and it seems to me that it is only equity and fair justice that the sum should be increased to $500,000. There was some testimony that $700,000 would be no more than a sufficient sum for the damage done. I submit that it is only justice that this sum should be increased to $500,000.

Mr. PAYNE. The testimony of Colonel Hull was that the award of the board was based not on the value at the time it was made, but on the value at the time of the injury. Of course, there might have been deterioration of the property after the incurrence of the injury, after the troops left, and the Government of the United States is not chargeable with that. If we paid for the deterioration after the time they left the buildings, then very likely it would require the amount in this amendment. Colonel Hull says:

I am confident $500,000 would not be an excessive award at this time.

Then he says:

Prices have increased wonderfully from the time I first went to the Philippines, in 1899, and I have no doubt that this has continued to go on. Five hundred thousand dollars to-day would not do any more than $360,000 would two years ago. It would do about the same.

However, I did not rise so particularly to oppose this amendment as to present a letter which I have received to-day from Bishop Hendrick, who is now in the city, in regard to the number of the followers of Aglipay, in the islands. I shall not have time to read the letter, but I want to say Bishop Hendrick probably knows more about the number of followers of this gentleman Aglipay than any other man now living, as he, since he was appointed bishop, has been on foot over all the islands over which he has jurisdiction and visited the 2,000,000 of Catholics he has in his charge. Among those he says that the followers of Aglipay will not exceed 11,175 in all. He also gives an estimate as to the other provinces. He says there are only 11,000 out of 2,000,000, and that after personally visiting them in the last two or three years. He gives the number in the other provinces like Manila. He says they are very rapidly decreasing in those provinces. I want to say, in addition to what has been said about Bishop Hendrick, that I have know him for forty years. I knew him when he was a priest in a small church in my county twenty odd years ago, and no man was ever more devoted to his people or ever more honest in the discharge of the duties of a priest than Bishop Hendrick when he was a priest. I ask unanimous consent to print the letter in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the letter to which he refers be included in his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

GONZAGA COLLEGE,
Washington, D. C., March 5, 1908.

To the Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry as to the number of Aglipayanos in the Philippines, permit me to say that the diocese of Cebu contains 2,000,000 of Christians. I have been to all the dioceses, and say that the proportion is as follows:

Cebu—700,000, Aglipayanos 1,000; Leyte—500,000, Aglipayanos 100; Bohol—250,000, Aglipayanos 75; Northern Mindanao—150,000, Aglipayanos 10,000; Siquihor—35,000, Aglipayanos none; Samar—400,000, Aglipayanos none; total—2,035,000, Aglipayanos 11,175.

The diocese of Nueva Caceres, about 850,000, Aglipayanos 8,000.

Diocese of Jaro, about 1,200,000, Aglipayanos 50,000.

Allowing 70,000 Aglipayanos in Manila and 35,000 Aglipayanos in Nueva Segovia, there appears a total of 174,175.

The dioceses of Jaro (pronounced Haro), Manila, and Vigan had a larger proportion of Aglipayanos. Say Manila, 100,000; Jaro, 75,000, and Vigan, 80,000. These figures are estimated from conversation with the bishops of these sees, and relate to the conditions four years ago. They gained adherents and money by always preaching that they were going to drive out the Americans. To do this they needed money to buy ships, arms, etc. It was absolutely not a religious, but a political movement, put under the form of a religion to protect it against the government, which had previously suppressed the same movement under the forms of labor unions and social organizations. As the people found out that the money they subscribed and paid liberally was not used for the purpose, they deserted the Aglipayano organization until now it is in a dying condition. In other words, it was purely a movement for graft. The figures given are most liberal Aglipayanism at its flood tide. Probably at the present time those willing to declare themselves Aglipayanos would not number one-fifth of the figures given.

T. A. HENDRICK.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the parliamentary status is now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, which is an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I think it is fair to the four gentlemen who signed the minority report that it be clearly understood and again emphasized here that they are not objecting to the payment of what the board, appointed under the orders of the War Department, found to be legally and legitimately due under the rules of law laid down. The only difference of opinion between the majority and the minority is as to how that $363,000 shall be paid.

That the United States Government owes somebody three hundred and sixty-three thousand and some odd dollars and cents is not to be denied. There is a difference of opinion among lawyers, who have approached the question from a legal standpoint and in a conscientious manner, as to how that money should be paid. But, Mr. Chairman, when it comes to the proposition of advancing the findings of the board, of entering into the realm of speculation as is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska, I must arise, although I have kept silent during this other discussion, and protest against it. I have no objection to paying, I desire to pay, this $363,000. If gentlemen differ with the four men who have signed this minority report and wish to differ from them upon the legal question, and wish to pay, that may be done; but I undertake to say here and now, Mr. Chairman, standing in my place as a Representative, without any prejudice, either political or religious, that nowhere from the beginning of this Republic down to now can you find a precedent to justify you in adding that $100,000 to this report, as is proposed by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HINSHAW]. Nowhere. This board, presided over by Lieutenant-Colonel Hull, as intelligent a witness as I ever heard testify before a committee or a court, told us how they passed upon that question, and they decided that under the rules laid down for them by the Secretary of War, Mr. Taft, who followed the practice that has been followed by the Court of Claims, by the Quartermaster-General's office, by every department of this Government from the foundation of the Republic until now, that $363,000 was due somebody.

I say to you gentlemen, now, in all seriousness that there is (whatever opinion there may be as to the $363,000) not one of you who, as a lawyer, not one of you who by taking any precedent that has ever been fixed by this Government, can find a single justification for adding to that $363,000. I think $40,000 of this amount ought to go out. If it did go out, I should not object, so far as I am concerned, to the payment of the remainder. But it is a well-determined and a well-fixed rule of law, which you have applied to all the sections of this country through all the years that are gone, that we will not pay for wanton damages. And yet the committee has added here in this bill $40,000 that are for wanton damages and the gentleman from Nebraska proposes to add $100,000 more. I undertake to say now that there is not a lawyer on this side of the House or on that side of the House who can go to the evidence that was on file in that committee room and find one single case where one single vestment was taken or one single sacred image was destroyed or one single sacred vessel in one of the churches was despoiled by an American soldier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. May I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent for three minutes more.

Mr. GARRETT. I say, take the action involved in this $40,000 and there is not a man here who as a lawyer, viewing it from a legal standpoint, can go to that committee room and take those papers and find a single case in which, if he were sitting as a judge between man and man, he would say the evidence would justify the finding that any single one of the items for which this payment of $40,000 was included was taken by a soldier of the Army of the United States. And not only that, but even if they were taken and wantonly destroyed, then by all the precedents this Government has never paid for such, neither when the party on this side was in power nor when the party on that side was in power. Now, gentlemen, why not march up to this question here now as lawyers and as Representatives? I am willing to pay anybody what we owe, but why should you add, how can you add, a gratuity? I hold in my hand now, Mr. Chairman, the report from the Court of Claims upon two cases down in the State of Tennessee. One of them was a school and the other was a church—little claims, involving in part use and in part destruction. They were refused by the Committee on War Claims in the House because they were Senate findings. They have been turned down by the Senate committee because the court did not make clear the distinction as to what was for use and what was for wanton destruction. Not one single item of the $40,000 that is added over this $363,000 on this claim can be made clear to be anything except wanton destruction, and the $100,000 proposed to be added is a gratuity; nothing else.

Now, that is a little school down there in Tennessee, and a little church, but the principle involved in those cases is precisely the same that is involved in the $40,000 added to the $363,000 and the extra $100,000 involved in the amendment offered by my friend from Nebraska [Mr. HINSHAW]. What are you going to do about it? That in Tennessee is not a big church, nor is the school a big one. It is a little church, a little independent organization, out in the country, out in the woods, but it is sacred to those people there. Are you going to treat people 10,000 miles from home better than you treat your own blood in your own land? If you want to do it, do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the situation. I read, very carefully read, the reports both of the majority and the minority upon this bill, but what difference is that?

The political necessities are great on this side of the House, but I hope they are not great enough to so far degrade this side of the House as to vote for the outrageous proposition which is now presented for a vote. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HINSHAW] to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment:

Strike out in lines 4 and 5 the words "four hundred and three thousand and thirty dollars and nineteen cents" and insert instead thereof the words "three hundred and sixty-three thousand and thirty dollars and nineteen cents."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "four hundred and three thousand and thirty dollars and nineteen cents" and insert in lieu thereof the words "three hundred and sixty-three thousand and thirty dollars and nineteen cents."

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just one more word in regard to this particular proposition. You have been told that the military board, of which Colonel Hull was the chairman, excluded all claim for vestments. He did so because no such claim was ever established to his satisfaction, and because, under this instruction given him by Secretary Taft, which I shall now read for the information of the House, he had no other alternative:

The seizure, however, of sacred vessels, of sacred vestments, presumed only by their absence at the end of the occupation by the soldiers, I should regard as of very doubtful validity, unless the evidence were direct tending to show that this course was taken by the soldiers and authorized by the officers, and especially are presumptions of this character not to be indulged in where there was previous occupation by the insurgents and where the evidence is not distinct of what the condition of the buildings was when entered and the presence of particular property when the United States entered into occupation. [I do not intend to advise the board to be technical or to be illiberal in estimating damages to property ordinarily incident to occupation by troops who are not particularly careful of the property in which they live, but I do wish to advise against the allowance of large damages for the disappearance of particularly valuable vessels or vestments which were probably stolen long before the troops entered into occupation, etc.]

As my friend and colleague on the committee [Mr. GARRETT] has said there is not one particle of testimony in this record, that there was not one word said before the Insular Affairs Committee which would justify any rational human being in believing that a single vestment of any character or description had been taken or stolen by United States soldiers. Under the rules laid down by the Secretary of War, that the board could not presume in the absence of evidence that any vestments had been taken, the board excluded them; and for this reason I ask the House now to vote for my amendment striking out the $40,000 allowed by the committee for vestments. There is no testimony in the record to show that a single particle of property of this description was ever taken by any United States soldier, and as I have already said, acting upon the explicit instructions of the Secretary of War, this board did what it was obliged to do, excluded claims of that character from consideration. It is in the power of Congress to pay $40,000, and to pay the $500,000 advocated by the gentleman from Nebraska, or indeed, the $2,000,000 or more that the church asked for. The question is whether or not, in the absence of any testimony that any such property was ever taken by any human being connected with the United States service, you are going to pay anything on this account. There is just as good reason for paying $1,000,000 as there is for paying $40,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the amount of $403,030.19 may be justified in two or three ways. When this bill was under discussion in general debate I undertook to explain to the Committee of the Whole the erroneous theory—the admittedly erroneous theory the Hull board adopted in estimating the damages.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It was not a theory, but the instructions of the Secretary of War.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was an erroneous instruction; and the Judge-Advocate of the War Department, whose testimony I have here, stated that damages inflicted by soldiers and prisoners of war on property which the Government used, and was in possession of at the time, should have been allowed for. It was admitted that no estimates had been made of those damages. No damages had been allowed on account of those injuries. If they had been allowed the just claim of the church would have exceeded $500,000. Colonel Hull testified that the condition of the cathedral at Manila after the prisoners of war had vacated it showed that the grossest acts of vandalism were committed in that building by the prisoners in our charge, and nothing was allowed for that. When it came to the question of the sacred vestments the commission reported that it was difficult to secure proof of the amount that the Federal Government was responsible for. On the theory of law I suggested a moment ago, if the furniture of a church is destroyed or carried away by our occupants, when we have excluded the owner and assumed the responsibility of tenant, under every principle of law and justice the Federal Government is responsible. Now the Hull board reported the total claim for ornaments, furniture, etc., was about $280,000, and under the best estimate they could make the fair proportion chargeable to the United States would be about $40,000.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. If you are assuming that this is a fair estimate of cost, why are you so particular in retaining the 19 cents?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I take the ground that the Hull board reported the fair and equitable share for the Federal Government to be $40,000. The 19 cents is admitted.

Mr. PAYNE. Could not the gentleman effect a compromise upon that 19 cents? [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not believe I will yield the 19 cents to the gentleman, either. [Laughter and applause.] I simply want the church to get what it ought to have, nothing more and nothing less. There is no justification for the exclusion of the $40,000 of this award. It is based upon the recommendation of the Hull board. That amount is mentioned by them; that amount is suggested. The committee included it and decided to recommend its payment as a fair and reasonable liability. Judge-Advocate Porter, when he came before the committee, said that it was a well-settled law that in all such cases the Federal Government would be responsible for the destruction of property in its occupation. We know that the property had been taken charge of and used by the Federal Government. I say there is abundant authority in the record, in the proof, for the payment of this $40,000 upon two theories, and we decided to allow the claim, and when we have made that payment we will fall, I repeat, drawing my inference from the report of the committee, many thousand dollars short of compensatory damages that were sustained by the Catholic Church on account of our occupancy of church and educational property and the destruction and damage we committed to it, for which in law we are clearly and legally responsible.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I wish to know whether this particular part of the award is allowed on account of the use of these vestments or their mere wanton destruction?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. There is no proof that any were taken.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is the destruction and carrying away of vestments. There were churches that contained furniture and vestments, and we took charge of the churches and their contents, and the furniture was destroyed and oftentimes carried away by our soldiers.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. There is no evidence of that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. We took from the owner the power to protect the property. We assumed the responsibility. It became our duty to protect the property as the tenant and occupant of the premises.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether it is the practice of this House to allow damages for the wanton destruction of such property in churches during the civil war? The purpose of my question is this: I want to vote on this proposition without reference to the church itself. If this is the sort of an allowance that we would make to a Methodist or Baptist church in Virginia or West Virginia, I want to vote for it. If it is not, I want to vote against it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is the rule everywhere that where the Government takes control or possession of a property for its own use it becomes responsible for the custody and care of the property. That is the ordinary legal obligation of a tenant; and if it commits waste, it is responsible under the law for the damages that it either commits or suffers to the property. I have before me a reference to the case of the Methodist Book Concern South. Its property was located, I believe, in the State of Tennessee. The Fifty-fifth Congress allowed a claim of $288,000 for occupancy and injury to the property during the civil war, and I have been informed by men who were acquainted with the property that it was not worth to exceed $50,000 when the Federal troops went into possession of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman does not know what he is talking about when he makes that statement. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I have only a little to say. It has been objected to the amount fixed by the committee that it includes wanton damages, and the objection is on the ground that wanton damages are never allowed for. I conceive that if the United States takes possession of private property and places its soldiery in that property, and that soldiery commit wanton injury, it is right and just that the United States should pay for it, and if that kind of damage has not been paid in cases before, for other churches or for other buildings, it ought to have been paid.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is exactly the principle that the committee pursued in estimating the amount that should be paid in this claim.

Mr. HARDY. I think the committee did right.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I want to say to the gentleman that I am not disputing the proposition which he lays down, that when the Government does put its soldiers into a church, and they commit wanton waste in the church, the Government ought to pay; but I know that similar propositions pending, for instance from West Virginia, in this very Congress have been denied. I am not so much objecting to having the principle extended as I am objecting to having it extended in the Philippines and denied in West Virginia. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. I can call the gentleman's attention to a distinction. I am a new Member and not familiar with old cases; but possibly the case the gentleman has reference to is where the soldiery wantonly and without being put in possession of property by those in authority have destroyed it or burned it. I can conceive of wanton injury being committed by soldiery in war, such as burning houses or property when not under control, where the Government ought not to pay; but where military authority takes charge and control of property, quarters its troops, and those troops wantonly destroy, deface, or damage the property, by all that is right they ought to compensate the owner.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. The case I referred to——

Mr. HARDY. Excuse me, but I have but little time. If the gentleman is right in that, it has been held that the Federal troops may be put into a church or private property, and then, if they damage it wantonly, the Government is not responsible. That doctrine is atrocious and miserably small and unjust.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. The case I refer to is one in West Virginia, where the Federal troops were quartered in a college, and where, in the course of being quartered there, they set fire to the building, and the Government refused to pay for it.

Mr. HARDY. I do not doubt the gentleman's statement, but I do say that this Government is big enough to do justice now or at any time, whatever it may have done heretofore. It ought to pay for your property. The objection that the majority report makes compensation for injury wantonly done to church property by the soldiery quartered there commends the report to me, and I shall vote for it because it is just.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] a moment ago said that somebody told him that the Southern Methodist Publishing House church claim, about $280,000, was only really about $50,000 upon its merits. I do not know who the gentleman's informant is, but whoever he is he is a liar. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, sir, I passed my eye over every item of that claim. I introduced the bill for its payment. Its merits were proven by people who helped to make and defend this country, to make Tennessee and Nashville and that church, from the printers, who testified to the destruction of the type and the paper, clear on through the long list of witnesses, all of truth and integrity, and yet for nearly forty years this Government refused to pay that great church its claim. I am glad, Mr. Chairman, we are to-day treating the Filipino and the savage a little better than we treat our own people in like matters. It may be that after a while we can teach ourselves that charity and justice should begin at home. [Applause.]

Mr. GILHAMS. Mr. Chairman, as I have been sitting here listening to the arguments presented to this House by the members of the Insular Committee, who have reported favorably upon this bill, and also to the leaders in behalf of the minority report, I am compelled to say that to my mind the question as to the rightful ownership of the property in question is perfectly clear.

And again, the objection that has been raised, or the plea that we are not authorizing through this bill the proper person to whom this money shall be paid, is not well taken.

The verdict of the court as to the rightful ownership of this property was so overwhelmingly in favor of the Roman Catholic Church that I can see no real cause for hesitancy in the payment of this just claim, and I shall vote for this bill to reimburse these religious and eleemosynary institutions.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the section and pending amendments be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 6, 7, and 8, the words "the same to be paid to the Archbishop of Manila, of the Philippine Islands, as representative and trustee of the Roman Catholic Church," and insert instead thereof "the same to be paid to the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church of the five dioceses of the church in the Philippine Islands, to be expended in said dioceses."

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if there is any title in the church——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Why is it not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has voted to close debate on the section and all amendments thereto. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES of Virginia) five gentlemen rose in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish for the other side?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I am perfectly willing to admit that the political necessities are too much for me. [Laughter.]

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES of Virginia) there were—ayes 182, noes 3.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEEKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16143, to provide for payment of the claims of the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a vote demanded on any particular amendment? If not, they will be considered in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Members of the House be given five days in which to print speeches upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that Members of the House be given five legislative days in which to print remarks upon this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INVESTIGATIONS AS TO SUBMARINES.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee of which Mr. BOUTELL is the chairman be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a clerk, messenger, and stenographer, and that the said assistants be paid out of the contingent fund on vouchers approved by the said select committee; and that said committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman if it is necessary to employ stenographic assistance. We have committee stenographers, and I would like to ask whether he has inquired as to whether or not this select committee could not be served by our committee stenographers?

Mr. BOUTELL. If that can be done, it will not be necessary to employ a stenographer. However, we wish authority to do so in case we have to act speedily and should be unable to avail ourselves of their assistance.

Mr. MANN. I can say to both of the gentlemen that if the committee sits at present the committee stenographers are now all engaged and are very busy. It is, indeed, impossible to furnish the present committees——

Mr. OLMSTED. And they are bringing them from Baltimore now.

Mr. TAWNEY. I just wanted to know if the gentleman had investigated the question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, by previous order of the House there is a special order to commence to-morrow at 2 o'clock for eulogies. I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the reading of the Journal it shall be in order until 2 o'clock to ask to take up bills on the Private Calendar, so it can be understood that the question of unanimous consent as to taking up each individual bill——

Mr. MANN. There are a very large number of bills on the Private Calendar——

The SPEAKER. The Chair fails to understand the request of the gentleman from New York. Is it to consider bills on the Private Calendar until 2 o'clock by unanimous consent, or is it that bills in order for to-day shall be in order until 2 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. PAYNE. I will ask unanimous consent to extend to-day until 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection if the gentleman asks unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calender to-day may be in order to-morrow unless objected to.

Mr. CARLIN. Why not extend that to bills on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the request of the gentleman to be that to-morrow until 2 o'clock shall be considered as to-day for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar in order for to-day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if that is the form of the request, I shall have to object. I have no objection——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now take a recess until 11.55 to-morrow morning.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman will see that that cuts out altogether the order for to-morrow, because if we adjourn after 12 o'clock——

Mr. PAYNE. We can adjourn any time before 2 o'clock——

Mr. MANN. But if we adjourn after 12 that goes over until Monday.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand the gentleman from Illinois will not object to unanimous consent to take up bills to-morrow on the Private Calendar that would be in order to-day, not to be considered unless unanimous consent is had for their consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 598. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 13102. An act to authorize the county of Elmore, Ala., to construct a bridge across Coosa River, Alabama.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 3409. An act to extend the time of payments on certain homestead entries in Oklahoma; and

S. 4351. An act for the relief of the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. LAFEAN was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Ambrose G. Bailey (H. R. 14732), Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DUNWELL was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of sickness.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table, and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an copy of a letter from the American minister to Portugal transmitting the acknowledgments of the Government and people of Portugal for the condolatory resolutions of the House on the occasion of the assassination of the King and Crown Prince of Portugal—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of appropriation for payment of a reward to W. H. M. Austin for services rendered the Department of Justice—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 7, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, for the beautiful custom, long since established in the Congress of the United States, of memorializing those of its Members who pass from earth to the realms beyond and rest from their labors. "The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance and the memory of the just shall be blessed." It quickens the nobler aspirations of those who survive and emphasizes the virtues of those who have passed on. Bless the special service of the hour in memory of one who served faithfully and efficiently upon the floor of this House and left behind him a record worthy of an American statesman, who in war and in peace lived to his convictions, and died respected and beloved by all who knew him.

Let the everlasting arms be about the bereaved family to uphold and sustain them in their affliction and comfort them in the hope of a family reunion in the realms above where there shall be no more sorrow and no more tears, and Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ELIZABETH H. OLCOTT.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill H. R. 2429 be taken from the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill H. R. 2429, entitled "An act granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth H. Olcott," with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendments were agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS BAYOU BARTHOLOMEW AT PORTLAND.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17510) to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew, Ashley County, Ark., at Portland.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Ashley, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Arkansas, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a steel drawbridge and approaches thereto, across the Bayou Bartholomew, at Portland, in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 5 strike out the words "they are" and insert in lieu thereof the word "is."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows:

A bill to authorize the county of Ashley, in the State of Arkansas, to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew, Ashley County, Ark., at Portland.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS BAYOU BARTHOLOMEW, AT WILMOT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17512) to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew, Ashley County, Ark., at Wilmot.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Ashley, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Arkansas, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a steel drawbridge and approaches thereto across the Bayou Bartholomew at Wilmot, in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 5 strike out the words "they are" and insert in lieu thereof the word "is."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The title was amended to read as follows:

A bill to authorize the county of Ashley, in the State of Arkansas, to construct a bridge across Bayou Bartholomew, Ashley County, Ark., at Wilmot.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WEBB, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers in the case of W. J. Roberts' pension claim, invalid pensions, Fifty-ninth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

THOMAS P. MORGAN, JR.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill in order on the Private Calendar under the order adopted on yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1081) to pay Thomas P. Morgan, jr., amount found due him by Court of Claims.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas P. Morgan, jr., $6,357.82, in satisfaction of the findings of the Court of Claims of the United States in the case of Thomas P. Morgan, No. 692, Congressional, on the dockets of said court, said amount being the sum due said Morgan on a dredging contract in Norfolk Harbor with the Government, and for which the Government got value received.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8 add the word "junior" after the word "Morgan."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say that the bill would take too long a time for consideration, and I think it ought not to be considered at this time. For that reason I shall have to object.

WILLIAM PARKER SEDGWICK.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1199) for the relief of William Parker Sedgwick.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

WILLIAM S. SHACKLETTE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12476) to place the name of William S. Shacklette on the retired list of the Navy as pharmacist.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to hear what this is about.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint upon the retired list of the Navy, with the rank of pharmacist, William S. Shacklette, formerly a hospital steward on the U. S. S. Bennington, and to receive three-fourths sea pay in lieu of the $30 per month pension which he is now receiving for total disabilities incurred at the time of the explosion of the boilers of the U. S. S. Bennington in July, 1905.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say that the Secretary of the Navy recommended an amendment to this bill, and if the gentleman in charge of the bill is willing to put it in the bill I certainly would have no objection.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I send the amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Navy," in line 6, down to the words "in lieu of," in line 8, and substitute therefor the following:

"As a hospital steward, William S. Shacklette, formerly a hospital steward on the U. S. S. Bennington, to receive the rank and three-fourths of the sea pay of a pharmacist in the Navy."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill with the proposed amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

JAMES BEHAN.

The next business on the private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3822), for the relief of James Behan.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3822) for the relief of James Behan.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a discharge to James Behan, who served on board the U. S. S. Vermont, U. S. S. Canandaigua, and U. S. S. Pinta, of the United States Navy, under the name of Michael Behan, in his true name, in lieu of the one he received for said service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

ROMAN SCHOLTER.

The next business on the private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6664) for the relief of Roman Scholter.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6664) for the relief of Roman Scholter.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Roman Scholter, of Oshkosh, Wis., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $432, said amount having been erroneously paid by the said Roman Scholter to the United States Government as duty upon pictorial paintings on glass, being works of art imported expressly for presentation to an incorporated religious society.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

GRANTING LANDS IN KNOX COUNTY, NEBR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10671) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple for certain lands of the Santee Reservation, in Nebraska, to the directors of school district No. 36, in Knox County, Nebr.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10671) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple for certain lands of the Santee Reservation, in Nebraska, to the directors of school district No. 36, in Knox County, Nebr.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized to issue patent in fee simple to school district No. 36, Knox County, Nebr., for a tract of not exceeding 2½ acres from the lands reserved for the Santee Agency, Nebr., described as the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 13, township 33 north, range 5 west, of the sixth principal meridian, Nebraska, upon such terms and conditions and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe; said tract to be used for school purposes under the laws of the State of Nebraska.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple for certain lands of the Santee Reservation, in Nebraska, to school district No. 36, in Knox County, Nebr."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

H. C. LINN AND SAMUEL POWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14000) for the relief of H. C. Linn and Samuel Powell.

The bill was read, as follows.

A bill (H. R. 14000) for the relief of H. C. Linn and Samuel Powell.

Be it enacted, etc., That H. C. Linn and Samuel Powell be, and are hereby, permitted to bring suit in the Court of Claims for whatever amount may be reasonably due them, if any, under their contract in writing, dated October 28, 1899, with J. H. Dick, as attorney for certain Cherokee Indians known as "Eastern" or "Emigrant" Cherokees. The said court is hereby given jurisdiction to entertain said suit and render final judgment therein, payable out of the amount appropriated by the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1906, to pay the final judgment rendered by said court in the consolidated causes lately pending therein, Nos. 23195, 23214, and 23212. In said suit the said J. H. Dick and the said Eastern or Emigrant Cherokees, collectively, shall be named as defendants, and the court may require such other person or persons to be made parties as may to the court seem proper for the equitable adjustment of the matter in controversy and for such purposes as the court may designate. Upon the institution of such suit written notice thereof to said Eastern or Emigrant Cherokees may be given by service on the Secretary of the Interior personally, and notice of said suit to the other defendant or defendants shall be given by publication or otherwise, as the court may direct. Pending final judgment in said suit so much of the amount heretofore appropriated by the act of June 30, 1906, as aforesaid, as may be necessary to pay said judgment shall be withheld from distribution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would withhold his objection.

Mr. MANN. Will not the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman wishes to make a statement, I will withhold the objection for that purpose. I am familiar with these claims. I reserve the objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to give these claimants a day in court. I understand it will impose no additional burden either upon the Government or the Indians or their property. It is claimed in behalf of these claimants that they did the work that entitles some one to a fee in this case. They entered into the original contract. They performed the work under the contract, but when the case was finally closed they were not taken into consideration. I am told that a sufficient amount to pay this claim has been retained from the amount allowed as a fee in this matter. It is only a question as to whether or not these men shall receive the amount to which they were entitled as fees in the case, and it imposes no additional expense either upon the Government or upon the Indians. It is a question of the distribution of the fee, and they simply ask the court to pass upon their rights.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman informed as to how much of this fund has alread been paid in attorney's fees?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman informed as to the size of the fund?

Mr. CAMPBELL. And I am not informed as to that particular matter.

Mr. MANN. I believe the size of the fund was $5,000,000. Fifteen per cent of that fund has already been paid to one set of attorneys and now another set of attorneys want another 10 per cent. Does the gentleman think the Government of the United States—the guardian and the custodian for the Indians to pay out this Indian money—ought to pay 25 per cent of the amount awarded—$5,000,000—for attorneys' fees?.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, if the Government, as such trustee, paid wrongfully the 15 per cent to men who are not entitled to the whole of it, it seems to me that some steps should be taken to do justice to the men who are entitled to their portion of it.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether the Government paid it wrongfully. It paid it by order of court, after adjudication.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Government ascertained the facts in the case, and the question is, What shall be done?

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There was an order of court made for the payment of fees. As I remember the order, this was in addition.

Mr. MANN. This is an addition. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] was mistaken when he said that the fund was being held up for the disposition of this dispute. The original fund has not yet been distributed under the appropriation of Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That was my understanding, and it was upon that that I made the statement.

Mr. MANN. But the attorney's fee has been paid, an enormous attorney's fee allowed by the court after adjudication. Now it is proposed to pay 10 per cent more—$500,000, and to these particular people $250,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, in the last session of Congress, during the consideration of the general deficiency bill, which carried an appropriation of $5,000,000 for the payment of this claim, this proposition to allow these two attorneys' fees in this case was offered as an amendment to that bill, and considered by the House and voted down at that time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to say this to the gentleman from Kansas: These Indians received $5,000,000. The court fixed the fees of the attorneys in that case at 15 per cent. These two men claim to have a contract, and instead of tying up the money that was allowed to the attorneys, and having the courts divide that fund among those who might be entitled to it, they ask that Congress now authorize the courts to distribute 10 per cent more of the $5,000,000 among other attorneys. Such a bill as that shall not pass by unanimous consent while I am in the House.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ESTATE OF SAMUEL BEATTY, DECEASED.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 13777) for the relief of the estate of Samuel Beatty, deceased.

The bill was read.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that that bill is not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ESTATE OF D. S. PHELAN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 1815) for the relief of the estate of D. S. Phelan.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the estate of D. S. Phelan, late of the State of Tennessee, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $169.02, balance in full of account due to the said D. S. Phelan for services rendered as mail contractor on route 10195, in the State of Tennessee, from January 1 to June 30, 1861.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that bill was originally referred to the Committee on War Claims, but was afterwards transferred to the Committee on Claims on February 3.

The SPEAKER. The bill was referred to the Committee on War Claims, but the reference seems to have been changed, for the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER], from the Committee on Claims, submits the report.

Mr. MANN. I investigated the matter in the Journal clerk's office, and the record there shows that the bill was transferred from the Committee on War Claims to the Committee on Claims on February 3.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CLARENCE FREDERICK CHAPMAN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 12499) for the relief of Clarence Frederick Chapman, United States Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the United States Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the roll of the Navy the name of Clarence Frederick Chapman, as ordinary seaman, and to honorably discharge said Clarence Frederick Chapman from the Navy, regardless of the findings of the court-martial held on board the U. S. S. Kearsarge, off Provincetown, Mass., July 3, 1905, and to pay to the said Clarence Frederick Chapman the sum of $316, being the amount of pay forfeited by the findings of said court-martial.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 6 strike out the word "honorably."
Strike out all after the word "five," in line 10, and add:
"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or emoluments be allowed by reason of the passage of this bill."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say to my colleague [Mr. FOSTER of Illinois] that I do not know whether this bill is introduced for the purpose of getting a pension or not. A very strong case is made in the report, and apparently the Navy Department itself reports that it would have reinstated the man if it could, but the bill as amended will not warrant the payment of a pension.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. I desire to say to the gentleman that the purpose of this bill is not to obtain a pension, but to clear the record of this young man, who we think was unduly punished.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that if this bill passes as amended this man will get a discharge without honor, which is practically of no use to him for any purpose. He will not be an honorably discharged man.

Mr. MANN. I think myself he ought to have an honorable discharge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the consideration of the House to vote down this amendment which seeks to deny him an honorable discharge. The first amendment provides that the word "honorable" be stricken out, and I ask that that amendment be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to test the sense of the House, as the Chair understands him, on agreeing to the first amendment, which proposes to strike out the word "honorable."

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Yes, Mr. Speaker; I ask that that amendment be voted down.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman desires that the man receive an honorable discharge.

The question was taken on the first amendment, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the second amendment.

The second amendment was considered and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

EASTERN SALT COMPANY, OF BOSTON, MASS.

The next business on the Private Calendar in order under the rule was the bill (H. R. 14361) to reimburse the Eastern Salt Company, of Boston, Mass., for certain excess duty.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Eastern Salt Company, of Boston, Mass., the sum of $384.84, the same being the amount of money paid by them as excess duty on certain salt in bulk, said salt having been erroneously appraised on entry.

The following committee amendment was also read:

In line 8, after the word "bulk," insert "imported by the schooner Norumbega, July 2, 1900."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose the bill properly ought to go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MANN. That is what I thought.

Mr. PAYNE. I have gone through the report, and if the facts are as there stated there is no objection to the bill passing.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York tell us something about it?

Mr. PAYNE. A cargo of salt was imported, and the bill of lading referred to it as so many hundred barrels of salt. Salt in bulk pays one rate of duty and salt in barrels pays double that rate. On this cargo there was levied and collected the duty on salt in barrels, because it was described in the bill of lading as salt in barrels. The evidence seems to be ample that the salt was in bulk, and the bill of lading referred to it as so many barrels as a means simply of describing the quantity of salt. Therefore I think they are entitled to have the excess of duty remitted. They furnish a plausible excuse for not discovering the discrepancy at the time. The clerk who had charge of the payment of customs duties was absent on his vacation, and they did not discover it until it was too late to file a protest.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to enter into a tariff discussion, but I would like to ask such eminent authority as the gentleman from New York why there is this difference of duty between salt in bulk and salt in barrels?

Mr. PAYNE. I will not undertake to give the gentleman from recollection now the reasons for the difference.

Mr. OLMSTED. The difference is in order to protect the labor which makes the barrels in this country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

GRANT OF LAND AT FORT NIOBRARA MILITARY RESERVATION, NEBR.

The next bill on the Private Calendar under the rule was the bill (S. 1931) to grant certain land part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Valentine for a site for a reservoir or tank to hold water to supply the public of said village.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the village of Valentine, a duly incorporated municipality under the statutes of the State of Nebraska, the northwest quarter and the north half of the southwest quarter of section 30, township 34 north, range 27 west, sixth principal meridian, in the State of Nebraska, the same being now a part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, the property of the United States: Provided, That the said tract shall be used by said village in supplying water to said village and its inhabitants, and not for other purposes: Provided further, That if the said village of Valentine shall cease the use of said land for a site to supply the said village and its inhabitants with water, the title hereby vested in it shall immediately revert to the United States.

The following committee amendments were read:

After the word "Nebraska," in line 5, insert the words "an easement in, on, and over."
After the words "United States," in line 10, insert the words "for the purpose of supplying to said village and its inhabitants water from a stream thereon, with the privilege to erect, construct, and maintain a dam, reservoir, and other facilities proper and convenient to the enjoyment of such easement."
Strike out all after the word "purposes," in line 2, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof a period.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to object to the consideration of the bill, but when consideration is reached I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to this bill. It was originally introduced as a straight grant and reported in as an easement in reference to water. Does the village propose to use all of this land; and if so, how? If it is to be used, what is the object in giving it an easement? If it is to be actually used, why does not the Government give it the land? It is a bill that I have not been able to understand.

Mr. KINKAID. The title to the land would be acceptable. The bill passed the Senate giving the title to the land as long as the water power was furnished for the village and its inhabitants. An objection was made to that by the House Committee on Military Affairs, and the contending parties agreed, finally, upon the bill introduced in its present form to give the village the use only for the purposes expressed, instead of granting the village title to the land to be used for the purpose expressed.

Now, it is to be used for the purpose of the erection and maintenance of a reservoir and to furnish water for the village and its inhabitants and for the transportation of water to the village across the land. It will use only such as may be necessary for the purpose expressed in the bill. That is all that is designed.

Mr. MANN. But the trouble is, Mr. Speaker, that if we grant an easement over a large piece of land what can we do with the land? If the village wants it, why don't we give the village the land? If the village does not want it, why do we reserve an easement on it so that we can not do anything else with it?

Mr. KINKAID. There is plenty of time to give the village the land in the future, if it shall be deemed expedient. If the Government wishes to part with the title, the village and private individuals will accept the title, but we are asking not for too much——

Mr. MANN. But we surely have the right to expect that some reason will be given why this is done.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the reason indicated seems to be that the Government is holding a string on this land so that if the village does not wish to continue its use as a reservoir site it will revert to the Government. They simply give them an easement, and if the village discontinues the use of it the land reverts to the Government. Is not that the idea?

Mr. KINKAID. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course it originated in the Senate, and I recognize the embarrassment of my friend from Nebraska trying to explain what was meant in another body. That is the only thing I can dig out of it. The idea was evidently in the mind of the gentleman who drew the bill that if the land was not used for a reservoir site, it would belong to the Government without any further transfer, nothing but an easement having been given.

Mr. MANN. I may say to my friend from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that I understand that most of this land is not to be used for a reservoir site, but quite the contrary. Most of it is not to be used at all by the village, but the easement is granted over all of it, so that the town is entitled to it.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if he ever knew of a case of a village trying to get land that it did not try to get a little more than it needed, in order to relieve Uncle Samuel to that extent from the care of his possessions?

Mr. MANN. Well, I would not want to undertake to say that. If it was the city of Chicago, we would not ask for anything more than we needed, being of a modest disposition—not as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] is. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. Is it not a fact that Chicago is taking everything in sight, and is it not trying now to extend itself into Indiana for the same purpose?

Mr. MANN. No; Chicago does covet the friendship and good will of Indiana, and would not object if it had part of that territory, but so far from attempting to take any of it away from Indiana, it attempts to throw the blanket of its good will over into Indiana.

Mr. PAYNE. It has gone clear out into the middle of the lake in order to get a drink of water.

Mr. MANN. Well, some gentlemen go farther than that to get a drink of water. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, as this discussion is closed, I would like to offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 5, on page 2, insert:
"Provided further, That this privilege shall not interfere with any existing vested rights."

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, that amendment is acceptable.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

A. E. COUCH.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 12292) for the relief of A. E. Couch.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $42.85 be, and the same is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to A. E. Crouch, of Carterton, Russell County, Va., being the amount of costs deposited by the said A. E. Couch with the Hon. L. P. Summers, collector of the sixth collection district of Virginia, and inadvertently by the said collector deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, when said sum should have been deposited with the Secretary of the Treasury as an offer of compromise of a certain criminal prosecution then pending in the United States district court for the western district of Virginia, against the said A. E. Couch, the said sum having been deposited in the Treasury of the United States on the 17th day of May, 1905.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have some information about the bill.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I will ask to have the Clerk read the report on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report in the time of the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Report to accompany H. R. 12292.]

The Committee on Claims, having considered the bill (H. R. 12292) for the relief of A. E. Couch, report the same favorably to the House and recommend its passage.

The facts in this case are fully set forth in the letter of the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury of date February 20, 1908, which is made a part of this report:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 20, 1908.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt from you of H. R. 12292, being a bill for the relief of A. E. Couch, of Carterton, Russell County, Va. It proposes an appropriation of $42.85, to be returned to the said Couch as an amount deposited by him with the collector of internal revenue and by the collector deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. This Department is requested to state the facts of the case and its views upon the merits of the bill.

The records of this Department show that in the year 1905 A. E. Couch was charged with a violation of the internal-revenue laws. He sought to compromise his liability and offered and paid the sum of $232.85 to the collector of the Sixth District of Virginia, of which amount $42.85 was paid as costs which had been incurred in the criminal proceeding pending against him.

The offer in compromise having been rejected, the proponent applied for the return of the money deposited. The sum of $190 being on deposit to the credit of the Secretary of the Treasury was returned to the proponent. The sum of $42.85 having erroneously been deposited by the collector to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, could not be returned.

The total sum deposited by the proponent as an offer in compromise of his liability—$232.85—having been offered for a specified purpose, and the offer having been rejected and $190 returned to him, the balance of $42.85 appears to be justly due him.

Respectfully,

GEO. B. CORTELYOU, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS,
House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE H. PENROSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar under the order was the bill (H. R. 16471) for the relief of George H. Penrose.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Capt. George H. Penrose, Quartermaster's Department, United States Army, the sum of $5,151.90 standing against him on the books of the Treasury, the said sum having been embezzled by one McCaull through no fault of the officer.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 7, strike out the word "ninety," and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighty-nine," and in line 8, after the word "Treasury," insert the words "of which the sum of $3,331.48 pertains to the Quartermaster's Department, and the sum of $1,820.41 pertains to the Subsistence Department."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is due to the House we have a full statement in regard to a bill of this sort, which is very unusual.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I may say this bill is recommended by the Secretary of War and has a unanimous report from the Committee on Claims. No better explanation could be made than the reading of the brief statement which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to be read in my time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

Credit in the accounts of Capt. George H. Penrose, Quartermaster's Department—

That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, directed to credit in the accounts of Capt. George H. Penrose, Quartermaster's Department, the sum of $3,331.48 of funds pertaining to the Quartermaster's Department, and $1,820.41 of funds pertaining to the Subsistence Department, now standing against him on the books of the Treasury (submitted).

NOTE.—On July 1, 1901, Capt. P. H. McCaull, assistant quartermaster of volunteers, was relieved from duty as quartermaster of the transport Egbert by Capt. George H. Penrose, quartermaster, United States Army. The Egbert was then at Seattle, Wash., undergoing repairs, with a view to carry troops and stores to Alaska. Upon Captain McCaull's relief, public funds to the amount of $9,513.41 were transferred to Captain Penrose, of which the sum of $3,445.92 seems to have been disbursed by him prior to the sailing of the transport, leaving a balance unexpended of $6,067.49. The quartermaster's clerk on the Egbert, John McCaull, was the son of Capt. P. H. McCaull, and had served in the capacity of clerk since April 14, 1889. Upon the urgent representations of Captain McCaull as to his capacity and integrity, he was continued in service by Captain Penrose. On July 31, 1901, Clerk McCaull disappeared. The doors of the storeroom and safe were immediately broken open by Captain Penrose, and the contents of the safe were examined in the presence of Lieut. P. H. Mullay, Fourteenth Infantry. The sum of $915.60 in gold and silver was found, but funds to the amount of $5,151.89 were missing. A sealed package, shaped like a package of bills, was found, marked "Capt. P. H. McCaull, Asst. Q. M. funds, 1901, $4,060." Immediately efforts were made to apprehend the absconding clerk, and a prosecution was at once instituted at the request of the War Department, but he was never apprehended. It was found, however, that on July 29, 1901, he had deposited the sum of $4,062.02 in the Seattle National Bank, a designated depository of the United States, to the credit of his father, Captain McCaull, and that amount has been deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation for Army transportation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901.

It is expected that disbursing officers of the Department shall keep public funds for which they are responsible in safes or in a Government depository. Captain Penrose received the safe combination from Clerk McCaull on July 1, when he took charge of the transport; so that at the date of the embezzlement both Captain Penrose and Clerk McCaull were in possession of the combination. Captain Penrose's reasons for not changing the combination of the safe are as follows:

"First. That there was no key by which it could be changed, nor any directions showing how it could be altered, as is usual in large safes.

"Second. That while the ship was at the Bremerton Navy-Yard being repaired and outfitted there was no expert procurable who could change such locks.

"Third. That during the extremely short stay in Seattle he had not the time to secure such an expert to do the work."

In view of all the circumstances of the case, the reasons above given for not changing the combination of the safe have been accepted by the Department as satisfactory. Captain Penrose is still an officer of the Quartermaster's Department and has rendered most excellent and capable service. He is an officer of proved integrity and capacity and of unusual efficiency. He is now employed as the constructing quartermaster of the new military post in the vicinity of Indianapolis, Ind.

Inasmuch as Captain Penrose used due and reasonable diligence in safeguarding the public funds in his possession, it is believed to be just that he should be relieved from the charge by the enactment of a clause of legislation authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow him a credit for the disbursement of the sum of $5,151.89, of which $3,331.48 pertain to the Quartermaster's Department and $1,820.41 to the Subsistence Department.

JANUARY 21, 1908.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. There is no objection to the consideration. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield for an inquiry.

Mr. MANN. The report which has just been read shows the quartermaster who had been on service in Alaska had been relieved, and Mr. Penrose appointed quartermaster, retaining the clerk of the previous quartermaster who was also the son of the previous quartermaster. I think the report makes a clear case as far as that part is concerned. Now, the clerk of the new quartermaster stole the money out of the safe, went to Oregon, or somewhere else, and deposited it in the Treasury to the credit of his father, the previous quartermaster. I believe there is no way of prosecuting or holding the bondsmen of the father of the thief, because that money was turned into the Treasury.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly.

Mr. MANN. It is one of these cases where we have no relief against anybody after losing the money.

Mr. OVERSTREET. And, if the gentleman will permit me, Mr. Speaker, in addition to what the gentleman from Illinois has just stated, which was quite correct, it may be said in favor of Captain Penrose that the embezzlement occurred but a very few days after he had taken charge and before it was possible for him to secure a change in the combination of the safe. He was detailed and left shortly for the Philippines. As a matter of fact the embezzlement was not discovered until he was upon the point of departure. It was no fault of his own, in the first place, that he accepted that clerk, for the reason that that clerk possessed a knowledge of the combination of the safe before Captain Penrose was given that information, and Captain Penrose received the combination of the safe from the very clerk who embezzled the money, all of which indicates that every possible care had been exercised by that officer.

Mr. MANN. This is a case that has arisen in this way without any fault on the part of the quartermaster, Captain Penrose; now, would it not suggest to the Committee on Military Affairs, or the proper committee of the House, the necessity of having these clerks under bond if they are to have access to the safe and have access to the money? In other words, can a clerk in a quartermaster's or postmaster's department of the Government carry off the funds and nobody found to be punished for it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I really am not familiar with the law relating to the bond of clerks of that class, but it would seem to me a wise provision to oblige bonds of such clerks.

Mr. MANN. Well, Captain Penrose says that he had no opportunity to change the combination of the safe. It is perfectly apparent that the previous quartermaster gave the combination of the safe to the clerk——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. But whether it is customary for clerks to have the combination like that gentleman, I do not know. I should think it was very necessary if quartermasters' clerks have access to safes and have access to the money and can carry it off, and then we relieve the quartermaster, as in this case, it seems perfectly just we ought to have some claim against the bondsmen of the clerk. I was trying to get a rise out of somebody on the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not on that committee, but the theory of the law is, the quartermaster himself is responsible for the acts of the clerk.

Mr. MANN. That is the theory of the law. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] is the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and his committee would not think for a moment of letting a money-order clerk handle money without giving a bond to protect the Government, although the postmaster might be responsible, as I understand it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly; but the neglect of Congress would not pay the unfortunate quartermaster who had his money embezzled by the clerk.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I am not opposing the payment of this claim.

Mr. PAYNE. May I suggest to the gentleman that the theory of the law is that the quartermaster is the man responsible to the Government, and he has to give bonds to the Government. Congress has lately relaxed that rule, so that when his subordinates have stolen the money without his fault we have been releasing the bondsmen and releasing the quartermaster, or the principal, in a great many cases. And it would seem if Congress is to go on with that policy, and which seems to be a just policy, so far as such a case as this is concerned, they ought to require the subordinate to give bonds, too, to the Government of the United States, so that the Government might locate the fault right where it is and put the embezzlement on the man that commits it and make his sureties responsible for the return of the money.

Mr. MANN. In this case, if the gentleman will permit me, the Government got the money that was in the safe, but in getting it it released the bondsmen of the quartermaster who was, in fact, the embezzler. The boy stole that money that was in the safe and turned it over to the Treasury, and it gave his father credit for it. His father was short.

Mr. PAYNE. This is a peculiar case. There is nothing like it in the history of the Government.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I would like to ask the gentleman if his understanding is that that committee ought to secure the necessary legislation requiring the clerks to give bond or whether that is not a matter for the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service?

Mr. MANN. It certainly is not a matter for the Committee on the Reform of the Civil Service. It has nothing to do with the civil service, it is perfectly apparent, and a bill on that subject would not be referred to that committee. I do not say that it is the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs, but that committee—and I am not finding fault with them, the gentleman understands—are our guardians and father confessors on military subjects, and we naturally go to them for information and experience on subjects of this kind, and I have learned in the House that upon matters relating to the military I want the information of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I want to say to the gentleman that no proposition to appoint clerks, either under military organization or anywhere else, has ever been submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs to my knowledge. If it becomes necessary to do so, if there is something wrong about it, and it is the duty of that committee to right that wrong, then of course I want to know it. The committee has always been willing to discharge any duty incumbent upon it, and if it is our duty to see that clerks do not steal the money of the Government, it is our duty to bring in those bills, and I think we will do it. But my impression was that it belonged entirely to another committee, either to the Committee on the Reform of the Civil Service or Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANN. Neither of those committees has any jurisdiction of the subject, as I understand it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has no objection to this particular bill?

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly patent that this man ought to be paid, even if the Government loses the money. It is proper to call the attention of the distinguished Committee on Military Affairs, I think, to the necessity of guarding against matters like this in the future. The very fact that this bill ought to be paid without question is the reason why legislation ought to be enacted on the subject.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the best way to focus the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs to legislation of this kind is for him to introduce a bill and refer it to that committee. Then the committee will have jurisdiction and the gentleman can follow it up and appear before that committee and urge upon them the importance of such legislation. I trust the gentleman in the multitude of his duties will find time to turn his attention to this matter and introduce such a bill in the near future, and ask the Committee on Military Affairs to act upon it.

Mr. MANN. Realizing, as I do, Mr. Speaker, that I have very little to do, and do not do very much, and have some leisure time, perhaps I will avail myself of that invitation after I have seen the Ways and Means Committee on some tariff proposition where legislation is necessary.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say that the latter committee is always there doing business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time and passed.

CHARLES E. MORTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17056) for the relief of Capt. Charles E. Morton, Sixteenth United States Infantry.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17056) for the relief of Capt. Charles E. Morton, Sixteenth United States Infantry.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Capt. Charles E. Morton, Sixteenth United States Infantry, the sum of $186, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse the said Capt. Charles E. Morton for the sum of $186, United States currency, which was stolen from the said Capt. Charles E. Morton, without fault or neglect on his part, while he was first lieutenant, Sixteenth United States Infantry, and acting disbursing officer at Echague, province of Isabela, Luzon, Philippine Islands, and which said sum the said Charles E. Morton has since paid into the Treasury of the United States in discharge of his liability as such disbursing officer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

ARCHIBALD G. STIRLING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the House joint resolution 134, for the relief of Archibald G. Striling, recently midshipman, United States Navy.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 134) for the relief of Archibald G. Stirling, recently midshipman, United States Navy.

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint former Midshipman Archibald G. Stirling to be an ensign in the United States Navy.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Line 5, after the word "Navy," add "to take the position he is entitled to by his order of merit, as shown by his examination for final graduation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation from the Committee on Naval Affairs. This seems to put a man into the Navy.

Mr. MANN. I can explain it, although I have nothing to do with the bill. This man was a midshipman, but he was unable to pass on account of his vision being 12.05, which is 2.05 below the standard required by the Department. He had had two years' service afloat, and the Department thinks he ought to go in the Navy. They want him to go into the Navy on account of the need of the service for additional men.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, the Department urges the passage of this bill for the benefit of the service.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

GEORGE S. PATTEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 17277) for the relief of George S. Patten, of Williams Coconino County, Ariz.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17277) for the relief of George S. Patten, of Williams, Coconino County, Ariz.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a deed of conveyance to George S. Patten, of Williams, Coconino County, Ariz., to the following-described lands, to wit: The northeast quarter of the northwest quarter and lots 1, 2, and 3 in section 18, township 23 north, range 6 east, Arizona.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the word "Arizona" and add to the end of the bill the words "Gila and Salt River base and meridan, Arizona Territory."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

JOHN SHAUGHNESSY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5297) to complete the naval record of John Shaughnessy.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5297) to complete the naval record of John Shaughnessy.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to so amend the naval record of John Shaughnessy, late landsman, United States Navy, on U. S. S. Brooklyn, as to show him honorably discharged, to date from October 9, 1864.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 6, after the word "him," strike out the word "honorably."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I will give the Naval Committee another chance. There seems to be no report with this bill from the Department.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been reported since the Calendar was made. There is a report, the Chair is informed.

Mr. MANN. If the Speaker will pardon me, there seems to be no report from the Navy Department.

Mr. BUTLER. Which bill does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. MANN. To House bill 5297, to complete the naval record of John Shaughnessy. Is it not the custom of the Naval Committee to refer bills of this sort to the Secretary of the Navy for report?

Mr. BUTLER. That bill was reported yesterday.

Mr. MANN. The report of the committee I have. There seems to be no report from the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War, both of whom are referred to in this report. This bill seems never to have been sent to the Navy Department for information, and I ask the gentleman if it is the custom of the Naval Committee in bills of this character to refer them to the Navy Department for information?

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman has been a Member of this House for twelve years and so have I. The gentleman knows we always ask the Department for advice. I did not report the bill, Mr. Speaker, and therefore I can not answer the gentleman's question whether the report of the Department is incorporated or not. Therefore, I will ask that the bill be passed without prejudice. I remember the facts very well, but do not remember the report from the Department.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing for the gentleman to state the facts. They are not very fully stated in the report, although I think we ought to have a report from the Navy Department or the War Department when it is proposed to change a man's record.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman that the report of the Navy Department should be on record, provided it can be obtained. I presume it could be obtained, but I can not go to the committee room for the purpose in time to move the passage of this bill at this time. It has the unanimous report of the committee. If the gentleman chooses to object, the bill can remain on the Calendar for future consideration.

Mr. MANN. I think the bill had better go over.

Mr. BUTLER. All right.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

JOHN CROWLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7807) to place John Crowley on the retired list of the United States Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7807) to place John Crowley on the retired list of the United States Navy.

Be it enacted, etc., That in consideration of services rendered in the United States Navy during a period of thirty-two years, from April 11, 1865, to June 20, 1897, that the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place John Crowley on the retired list of the Navy with the retired pay of the rating in which he was serving at the time of his last honorable discharge.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Pennsylvania was inclined to rather take offense and show feeling as though he thought I might have intended to offend his committee when I asked if it was the custom of his committee to refer bills of this kind to the Navy Department for report. Yet here are two bills in succession, neither one of which has been sent to the Navy Department, both proposing to amend the record or change the status of Navy enlisted men—a proposition to put a man on the retired list of the Navy—and yet the bill has never been sent to the Navy Department. I do not want to offend the feelings of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not finding any fault with any statement that the gentleman may make. He may object to the consideration of the bill. I have no request to make. I know nothing at all about the report from the Navy Department, and do not know positively whether any Department report was obtained in this case. I did not make the committee report.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it ever went to the Navy Department.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I presume it did.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

MATE WILLIAM JENNEY, UNITED STATES NAVY, AND OTHERS, RETIRED.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 17059) for the relief of Mate William Jenney, United States Navy, retired, and the eight other retired mates who have been placed on the retired list with the rank and pay of one grade above that actually held by them at the time of retirement.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Mate William Jenney, United States Navy, retired, and the eight other retired mates who have been placed on the retired list of the Navy, with the rank and pay of one grade above that actually held by them at the time of retirement by reason of their creditable civil war service under the provisions of the acts of Congress approved March 3, 1899, and June 29, 1906, shall be credited with all their prior actual service either as officers or enlisted men in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, in computing their pay on the retired list from the date of their advancement under the provisions of said acts.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think there ought to be a pretty full explanation of this bill from the Naval Committee.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, it seems that this legislation is necessary in order to set aside an arbitrary decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury that really seems to be contrary to the act of March 3, 1899. That act provides that any officer of the Navy with a creditable record who served during the civil war shall, when retired, be retired with the rank and three-fourths of the sea pay of the next higher grade. That seems to me to be mandatory. Yet the Comptroller of the Treasury decided that they were to receive only the smallest pay.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to say how many men have been retired in the Navy and the Army who are subject to the same ruling of the Comptroller?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. In this service there were twenty-eight originally——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean in this service or in this class?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. The others have all got it, except eight men.

Mr. MANN. No one has got it under the original law, under this decision of the Comptroller. Mates are not the only men on the retired list of the Navy, as I understand it, under this law, and this decision of the Comptroller was not made as to this mate or these particular mates. It was a general ruling. Now, is the gentleman able to tell us how many men on the retired list of the Navy and the Army are affected by the same decision of the Comptroller?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. I am not able to answer that question, but the passage of this act will grant relief to the eight men who are now living.

Mr. MANN. Or nine, to be more accurate; one and eight others make nine, I believe, if my arithmetic is correct. But the gentleman proposes to take a decision of the Comptroller and wipe it out as to nine men. My opinion is that it more likely applies to 900.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. I do not think so. Has the gentleman's attention been called to a letter of the Secretary of the Navy on this subject?

Mr. MANN. I have read the report.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. You will find that in the report, which I ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Pending that, I should like to ask the gentleman what is the purpose of this bill?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. The report will give the gentleman the purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17059) for the relief of Mate William Jenney, United States Navy, retired, and the eight other retired mates who have been placed on the retired list with the rank and pay of one grade above that actually held by them at the time of retirement, submit the following report:

It appears from the Official Register of the Navy that William Jenney was a mate in the Navy March 19, 1861; acting ensign, November 27, 1863; honorably discharged January 11, 1866; appointed a mate in the Navy December 6, 1869, and retired on account of reaching the age of 62 years on September 26, 1899, under section 1444 of the Revised Statutes.

Mate Jenney was one of the twenty-eight mates in the Navy August 1, 1894, to whom the act approved on that date (28 Stat. L., 212) applies.

Section 11 of the act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat. L., 1007) provides:

"That any officer of the Navy, with a creditable record, who served during the civil war shall, when retired, be retired with the rank and three-fourths the sea pay of the next higher grade."

On September 14, 1899, Mate Jenney was notified of his retirement by the Secretary of the Navy in accordance with the provisions of section 1444 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 554), gave a similar advancement for like reasons.

The Comptroller of the Treasury in his construction of these statutes held that the mates in question are entitled only to the lowest pay of warrant officers and not to the pay of warrant officers with the same length of service; and while it was the undoubted intention of the acts referred to to advance the retired pay of these officers, they will under this holding, as a matter of fact, get no greater pay than they previously received.

Your committee is of the opinion that the passage of this bill is necessary if these officers are to receive the relief it was intended to give them in previous legislation.

In support of this view the following letter from the Secretary of the Navy is submitted herewith and made a part of this report:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 21, 1908.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 14th instant, requesting the Department's view with reference to a bill (H. R. 17059) "for the relief of Mate William Jenney, United States Navy, retired, and the eight other retired mates who have been placed on the retired list with the rank and pay of one grade above that actually held by them at the time of retirement."

Inasmuch as the Comptroller of the Treasury has held that the mates in question are entitled only to the lowest pay of warrant officers and not to the pay of warrant officers with the same length of service, the effect of the advancement provided for by the acts of March 3, 1899, and June 29, 1906, will be to give these officers no greater pay than that they previously received.

Favorable consideration of the bill (H. R. 17059) is therefore recommended, for the purpose of extending to these mates the benefits of increased compensation on advance in rank, as was obviously intended by the acts of March 3, 1899, and June 29, 1906.

Very respectfully,

V. H. METCALF, Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

In view of the foregoing, your committee is of the opinion that H. R. 17059 should pass. We therefore submit it with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Speaker, I take it the purpose of this bill is to increase the pay that these men get on the retired list. Does the gentleman know how much they are getting now?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Nine hundred dollars.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Nine hundred a year?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Are they officers or enlisted men?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. I understand they were all officers, and one of them is as much as 80 years old.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. How much will their retired pay be increased if the bill passes?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. As I understand, their pay will be three-fourths of $1,800 a year. That was their sea pay for the length of service rendered, and, as I understand this act, it would give them three-fourths of their sea pay.

Mr. BUTLER. It is just to equalize it as to the officers of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Yes; that is the object of the bill.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. They served in the Navy until they came to their retirement?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. And this simply puts them on a par with other officers who had similar service?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. That is all.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as I understand it, is to correct what was obviously intended to be done by statute. The statute of 1899 is mandatory in character and says that this shall be done.

A subsequent statute, passed in 1905, had the same end in view, but by a holding of the Comptroller when this matter came up for consideration these nine men were excluded from the provisions of those acts; they were old soldiers who had served through the war, and by virtue of their retirement coming at a particular time the Comptroller held that they were excluded, and they are not receiving the benefit that others of their class are receiving. I think there are only nine—this man and eight others. They served with distinction through the war, and the statute intended to give them the benefit that it gave the other officers of like character. They gave them the advance in rank, but no corresponding advance in pay, as was intended by the act, for the reason that the Comptroller held that they did not come within the act. The committee, after investigating it and examining the report of the Comptroller, reached the conclusion that such a holding worked a great injustice. The report is unanimous, and is backed by a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, who says that the legislation referred to was obviously intended to benefit these men, but under the ruling they are excluded, and we only desire to correct that oversight or inequality existing under that ruling and to put these men in a position to receive what it was intended they should have.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. I am speaking in the time of the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Just what will be accomplished by this bill?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Under the statute at the present time these men are getting three-fourth of the pay which the Comptroller held they should receive—that is, three-fourths of $1,200.

Under the bill, if it becomes a law, they will get three-quarters of the pay of the rank which they retired on, which would be three-fourths of $1,800.

Mr. MANN. They were mates; they were retired with the rank and pay of what grade, warrant officers?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is the pay of warrant officers?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Eighteen hundred dollars.

Mr. MANN. Is that the lowest pay of a warrant officer?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. The lowest pay of the class in which they were placed.

Mr. MANN. What is the class in which they were placed? What is the lowest pay of a warrant officer? The gentleman says $1,800.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Twelve hundred dollars is the lowest.

Mr. MANN. That is what I thought. That is what the law provides for, and that is what they are getting.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Their rank was above that.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by saying that "their rank was above that?" Does the gentleman mean that their rank would have been above that if they had served as warrant officers twenty or thirty years? This bill apparently proposes to give to these officers the rank and retired pay of a warrant officer if they had served as warrant officers for a great many years, which they never served at all.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. But they did.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, they were never warrant officers. They never had the rank or pay of warrant officers until retired.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. The act clearly says "shall when retired be retired with the rank and three-quarters pay of the next higher grade."

Mr. MANN. They were retired with that rank, but never served with that rank.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Because they reached the retiring age.

Mr. MANN. They were mates; that is what the bill shows. They reached the age of retirement, and thereupon they were retired with the rank of warrant officers, but they had never served as warrant officers. Now, the proposition is not only to give them that advantage, but to give them the additional advantage of having served as warrant officers for many years. The same case arises in the Army. We have had the same proposition in other committees of the House.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. I want the gentleman to understand that I have no special interest in this bill. This is simply a matter of justice to the men.

Mr. MANN. I understand that.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. I believe these men have done good service, and they are entitled to more than three-quarters of $1,200 pay.

Mr. MANN. They are now getting $75 a month, which would be considered an extremely large pension to any enlisted man in the Army or in the Navy.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I would like to ask the gentleman another question. How long did these men serve after they went into the Navy?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. In the case of Mr. Jenney, this report shows that he was enlisted March 19 1861, and was given notice of his retirement on September 14, 1899. Now, he was discharged in 1866, and then reenlisted, and was retired in 1899. That shows a long service.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I am not inclined to be captious about that, but the Committee on Military Affairs is fairly flooded with applications to increase the pay of men on the retired list—that is, to give them a higher rating—and it is sometimes complained to us that the Naval Committee is much more liberal than the Committee on Military Affairs. I shall not object, however.

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, it will be found by reference to this act of March 3, 1899, known as the "personnel act," which is mandatory, that any officer of the Navy with a creditable record shall, when retired, be retired with the rank and three-quarters of the sea pay of the next higher grade. On September 14, 1899, the same year this act was passed, Mr. Jenney was retired by the Secretary of the Navy in accordance with the provisions of law, but under the holding of the Comptroller he could not have this pay which the personnel act, in express terms, said he should have. He was not retired until after the passage of that act giving him the right to that pay, and then under that ruling he could not receive the pay.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand the gentleman is correct in his statement of the facts. I understand these officers had received and have received from the date of their retirement three-quarters of the sea pay of the next higher grade than mates. They were mates and they have received three-quarters of the sea pay of a warrant officer, which is $100 a month. Now, the gentleman proposes not only to give them an increase of pay more than is provided by the act, but to date that back to 1899. There has not been such a bill reported into this House from any other committee of the House. The Committee on Military Affairs has constantly, as I am informed, turned down these bills. The committee of which I have the honor to be one of the members has refused to recommend the passage of such a bill, and I do not believe that it receives, in the hurry of making up an appropriation bill, that due consideration which the Committee on Naval Affairs usually gives to everything which comes before it.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Does not the gentleman understand that these officers were getting $900 before the passage of this act?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I presume very likely. I presume they were getting $1,200.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon a question. Are there not certain retired rear-admirals who bear the same relation to other admirals retired since the personnel act that these mates do to other mates retired since the personnel act, and is there not a bill pending in the Naval Committee for their relief at this time?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. I am not certain, but I think there is. I did not quite catch the question of the gentleman.

Mr. WEEKS. Are there not certain retired rear-admirals who were retired before the passage of the personnel act who bear the same relation to those retired since the personnel act that these mates do to mates who have been retired since the personnel act?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; and, if I recollect correctly, I believe that bill was ordered yesterday to be reported favorably.

Mr. WEEKS. The case is exactly the same, is it not?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes. There are a few of these mates that have not been provided for under the personnel act of 1899, and the reason for that is stated in this report from the Department. The bill referred to by the gentleman, I believe, was ordered yesterday to be reported favorably.

Mr. WEEKS. The fact is that any mate retired since the personnel act is receiving three-quarters of $1,800.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. And these mates who were retired before the passage of the act are receiving three-quarters of $1,200, and their civil-war service was the same.

Mr. BUTLER. Their civil-war service was the same, and the personnel act of 1899, section 11, directs that they shall receive three-quarters of the sea pay of one grade above that at which they were retired.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I believe this to be a just and fair measure. These mates are entitled to the advance asked for, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will not object.

Mr. LAWRENCE. As I understand it, the law provides that an officer going upon the retired list shall be retired at three-quarters' pay of the rank above that which he holds at the time of the retirement where he had civil-war service.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Yes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. These parties for whose relief this bill is proposed were not, as a matter of fact, retired at the next grade above that which they held at the time of the retirement.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. No; they were not.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And so you seek simply to place them upon a par with mates who would to-day be retired?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Yes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And who would receive three-quarters of $1,800?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. To $1,800.

Mr. LAWRENCE. So all you seek to do for these nine men is to place them on a par with other men of equal grade.

Mr. MANN. Is it the intent of the committee, of which the gentleman is a distinguished member, to bring into the House from time to time bills to equalize the pay of all officers and enlisted men who were placed on the retired list, every time an advance in pay is made; that the officers already on the retired list shall have the benefit of the increase of pay so as to equalize their salaries?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. This only applies to civil war veterans.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the gentleman talks about equalizing pay and putting men on the same plane. Now, we passed an item for the increased pay of the enlisted men of the Army the other day. If I remember rightly, the Military Affairs Committee, in reporting that proposition, were very careful that the increase in pay should not apply to men already on the retired list, taking the position that when a man is lucky enough to get on the retired list of the Army or Navy, and he is luckier than anyone else who serves the Government, that he ought to be satisfied with what he gets and not make him up into part of a lobby to constantly urge an increase of any salaries, he probably having nothing else to do.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that that is hardly applicable to this case. We only ask to have these men placed on the same plane they would have if they were retired to-day, veterans of the civil war.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I will reply to the gentleman if he will listen. I will not, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs or as a Member of this House, vote to increase the pay of any man upon the retired list unless he served creditably and well in the civil war. We reported this bill that the pay of these eight or nine old sailors might be the same upon the retired list which their brothers who served in the civil war are now receiving. If they had not served in the civil war, I would not ask my friend to vote for their relief.

Mr. MANN. I supposed the gentleman was in favor of that proposition, possibly to put men on retired pay, but upon a much higher salary than he would have otherwise received, because he served two or three days in a clerk's office or something corresponding to that in the civil war.

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. MANN. Such a man is now on the retired list, and it is a shame and disgrace to this Government that it ever put him there for that reason——

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know to whom the gentleman refers, but I am sorry to have assisted in the passage of such a measure if I did so. This man, William Jenney, was honorably discharged from the service in 1866. He enlisted March 19, 1861. He had a long and faithful as well as honorable war service, and for that reason, I assure my friend, we reported this bill favorably. We think he and the other men here provided for should have the same pay that other mates have who were more fortunate to be retired a short time after the passage of the personnel act of 1899.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman inform me what this means in this bill:

Shall be credited with all their prior actual service, either as officers or enlisted men in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, in computing their pay on the retired list from the date of their advancement under the provisions of said act.

What does that mean?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I can not answer the question. I know it is the intention of the Committee on Naval Affairs that they shall not receive what is commonly known as "back pay," and inasmuch as there seems to be—I am not authorized, the gentleman from Delaware introduced the bill and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS] reported it, after having passed the committee unanimously—but with the consent of the two gentlemen I will ask that the bill be laid aside until the Private Calendar is reached in regular order.

The SPEAKER. The bill is under consideration now, as the Chair understands. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PATENTS TO LANDS, IDAHO, TO BOARD OF MISSIONS, PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar, under the rule, was the bill (H. R 17005) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee to the Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church for certain lands in the State of Idaho.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Protestant Episcopal Church among the Fort Hall Indians in Idaho has for about twenty years been maintaining at large expense religious and educational work among the Indians of the Fort Hall Reservation, Idaho; and

Whereas certain lands on said reservations have been by proper authority set apart for the use of said church, and said church has made valuable improvements, consisting of mission and church buildings, upon the lands so set apart: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue patents in fee to the Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States for the following-described lands: The southeast quarter of section 36, township 4 south, range 34 east, of Boise meridian, containing 160 acres: Provided, That the lands so granted shall perpetually be used for religious and educational purposes.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Amend by striking out the preamble, page 1, and strike out the proviso, lines 5 and 6, page 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire who has charge of this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. What committee is it reported from?

Mr. MANN. From the Committee on Indian Affairs. The bill seems to be a perfectly proper bill, except they have not put an amendment in which the Department recommends and which ought to go in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask why the last two lines were stricken out, namely:

Provided, That the lands so granted shall be perpetually used for religious and educational purposes.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that probably the principal reason was, as appears from the report, that a similar bill without those lines in had been introduced in the Senate and reported upon by the Secretary of the Interior in favor of the passage of the bill, with an amendment which is not in here, and I suppose that the committee in the House made the two bills conform.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I do not make any objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. MANN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That the said patents shall not issue until the Indians of the said reservation shall have given their consent to the grant through their business committee or council, in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall provide."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

WOODLAWN CEMETERY ASSOCIATION.

The next business on the Private Calendar, under the rule, was the bill (H. R. 17167), authorizing the Woodlawn Cemetery Association, of St. Maries, Idaho, to purchase not to exceed 40 acres of land from the United States, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to sell to the Woodlawn Cemetery Association, of St. Maries, Idaho, land not to exceed in area 40 acres which may be selected by the cemetery association: Provided, That this land shall be selected from the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation: And provided further, That the Woodlawn Cemetery Association, of St. Maries, Idaho, shall pay to the Government of the United States the appraised value of the land, the proceeds of the sale to be turned into the moneys accruing from the disposition of the unallotted Indian lands as provided in the act authorizing the opening of the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Amend by inserting after the word "association," in line 6, the following: "and subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Amend the title by striking out the words "from the United States" and inserting in lieu thereof "in the Cœur d'Alene Indian Reservation in Idaho."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to insert on line 5, before the word "land," the word "nonmineral," so as to make it read "nonmineral land."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 5, before the word "land," insert the word "nonmineral," so as to read "nonmineral land."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The title was amended to read as follows:

A bill authorizing the Woodlawn Cemetery Association, of St. Maries, Idaho, to purchase not to exceed 40 acres of land in the Cœur d'Alene Indian Reservation in Idaho.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution from the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business during the Sixtieth Congress; also that the committee be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has this committee met yet?

Mr. WEEKS. It has; yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are you going to hold hearings during the sessions of the House?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I will object to that part of the resolution, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WEEKS. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York that similar privilege has been granted to other committees of the same character.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have noticed that, and I have decided to object hereafter until it is shown there is some necessity for it. If every committee in the House has leave to sit during sessions there will be nobody present in the House; and unless the committee finds necessity for that privilege, I think it will be necessary for them to wait.

Mr. WEEKS. We shall not use it unless there is necessity for it.

Mr. MANN. I would like to say to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] that I have served more than ten years now on one of the leading committees of the House, which never has asked, I believe, the privilege of sitting during the sessions of the House. We find it a great convenience not to have the authority, so that we may be properly on the floor of the House.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I have no disposition to sit during the sessions of the House unless it is necessary, and the privilege that is asked here is exactly what has been granted other committees within the past week.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the rule provides that committees shall not sit during the sessions of the House without the consent of the House, and unless there is some imperative necessity the House should not grant it. I object to that portion of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman modify his resolution?

Mr. WEEKS. I modify the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business during the Sixtieth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF WAR CLAIMS COMMITTEE.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that we now take up the consideration of business reported from the War Claims Committee on the Calendar.

D. M. SPRAGUE AND WILLIAM TILTON.

The first business on the Private Calendar was House resolution 171.

The resolution was read, as follows:

House resolution 171.

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 13554) for the relief of D. M. Sprague and William Tilton, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the Tucker Act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it was not expected that business reported from the Committee on War Claims would be taken up, although it is in order. I think the gentleman ought to make an explanation of war claims bills, under the circumstances, as we go along. Here is a proposition to refer to the Court of Claims. We had a bill on the Calendar this morning that was referred to the Court of Claims in 1886 by the Committee on Claims, not by the House. The report was made by the Court of Claims in 1905 to the House, not to the committee, as the law provided. It seems to me that the committee has power to refer these claims to the Court of Claims. All that the distinguished gentleman from Vermont needs to do is to have his committee meet and present to that committee a resolution referring this bill to the Court of Claims, and to the Court of Claims it goes, and the parties have the right to file their petition there, and the Assistant Attorney-General of the United States has the right to appear for the defense, and the court makes its findings. Now, why——

Mr. HASKINS. If the gentleman will permit me. It is provided in the provisions of the Bowman Act, approved March 3, 1883, that the committee have authority to refer direct to the Court of Claims; but bills or claims presented that come under the provisions of the Tucker Act can only be referred to the Court of Claims by action of the House itself.

Mr. MANN. Ah, I understand; you can refer any bill under the Bowman Act.

Mr. HASKINS. No; the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The Bowman Act is as broad as it can be. Of course the claimant does not have the same rights. The Government does not waive as much under the Bowman Act as it does under the Tucker Act; but you can take the claims to the Court of Claims under the Tucker Act just as well as under the Bowman Act.

Mr. HASKINS. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois can consume a great deal of time if he wishes. If he will allow me to answer him concerning this bill, I will state that the claimant in this case alleges that he was under a contract with the United States Government to furnish corn at $1.35 a bushel, hay at $35 per ton, and oats at $1.10 per bushel; that he furnished 2,243 bushels of corn, 256 bushels of oats, and 28 tons of hay, and when he was paid by the Government he was paid at the rate of $1.05 a bushel for the corn, 78 cents a bushel for the oats, and $29 per ton for the hay. Now, this bill has been reported before. It was reported at the first session of the Fiftieth Congress for a direct appropriation for this balance. Again, at the second session of the Fiftieth Congress it was again reported favorably. At the first session of the Fifty-first Congress no less distinguished gentleman than General Grosvenor, of Ohio, reported from the War Claims Committee in favor of the passage of the bill and a direct appropriation for the balance which this claimant now claims. But I have some little question about it; the committee have; and therefore they ask to have it sent to the Court of Claims and let him try his case out there. The claim has been three times reported favorably—once by General Grosvenor——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman seems to take exception to the fact that I asked a question about the bill.

Mr. HASKINS. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps it is embarrassing to him to say why he did not refer this to the Court of Claims from his committee instead of coming into the House for the purpose of having it referred. I do not want to embarrass the gentleman in any way.

Mr. HASKINS. There is nothing that the gentleman from Illinois can say that will embarrass me in the least.

Mr. MANN. I trust that is true.

Mr. HASKINS. He had so much to say in the beginning that I had not time until after he had attempted to embarrass me, and of course I followed his statement.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman still has not told the House why this claim can not be referred directly from his committee to the Court of Claims instead of bringing the resolution into the House.

Mr. HASKINS. Because there is no provision whatever in the Tucker Act authorizing any committee to refer a claim from the committee directly to the Court of Claims.

Mr. MANN. No; but there is in the Bowman Act.

Mr. HASKINS. There is in the Bowman Act, but this is a case that does not come within the provisions of the Bowman Act at all.

Mr. MANN. The Bowman Act authorizes these bills to be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. CHANEY. The Bowman Act authorizes a committee of the House of Representatives to send to the Court of Claims a claim which has before that time been presented either to the Southern Claims Commission or to an Executive Department for consideration. Unless that has been done, it is not referable to the Court of Claims under the Bowman Act. This is a claim, as I understand, which has never been referred to the Southern Claims Commission, and it was never referred to an Executive Department for consideration. It is therefore not referable to the Court of Claims but by resolution under the Tucker Act. The gentleman is therefore proceeding in the only way that he can ever get to the Court of Claims with this case.

Mr. HASKINS. And in addition, as I understand it, the Bowman Act gives the Court of Claims jurisdiction over the property taken by the Federal Army in an insurrectionary State. This is a claim of a citizen of a loyal State. It does not come within the provisions of the Bowman Act at all. It is only under the provisions of the Tucker Act. This man was a resident of a loyal State, and made his contract with the Quartermaster of the Army.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand that that distinction exists as to the Bowman Act at all.

Mr. HASKINS. It certainly does.

Mr. MANN. You can refer any kind of a claim under the Bowman Act. The Bowman Act does provide, however (and that is just what I wanted the gentleman to state, which he would not do), that in order to get a finding in a case, a man must in some way have prosecuted his claim. He must have called attention to the fact that he had a claim, before thirty or forty years had passed. It might have been filed with the Department or with the Southern Claims Commission. If that was not done, then the Court of Claims could not make a finding in the case. A man who has a claim against the Government and makes no effort to prosecute it for twenty, thirty, or forty years has not much standing in my opinion.

Mr. HASKINS. This has been pending in a good many Congresses before. Claims for private property taken from citizens of loyal States are first presented to the Quartermaster-General under the law for adjudication. This was presented to the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. MANN. And hence could be referred under the Bowman Act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

J. E. CALDWELL.

The next business was House resolution 172.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 4554) for the relief of J. E. Caldwell, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the "Tucker Act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHESTER BETHELL.

The next business was House resolution 173.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 9629) for the relief of Chester Bethell, with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts under the terms of the act of March 3, 1887, and generally known as the "Tucker Act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LIEUT. COMMANDER KENNETH M'ALPINE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that there was one bill in order from the Committee on Naval Affairs, as the Chair is informed. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Lieut. Commander Kenneth McAlpine, United States Navy, a commander in the Navy on the active list, subject to examination, to take rank next after Gustav Kaemmerling, as originally borne on the Navy Register from 1886 to 1903.

SEC. 2. That the said Kenneth McAlpine shall be considered to have been continuously in the naval service from the date of his appointment on September 13, 1877, but that he shall receive no pay or emolument for the period from July 17, 1903, to March 3, 1905; and that he shall be additional to the number of officers prescribed by law for the grade of commander in the Navy, and to any grade to which he may thereafter be promoted.

SEC. 3. That the said Kenneth McAlpine shall perform engineering duty only, on shore only.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this bill been reported?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that this bill was reported, presumably this morning. It is not upon the Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let us have an explanation to the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, in 1903, Lieut. Kenneth McAlpine, an engineer officer in the United States Navy, was ordered up for examination for promotion. He went up for examination before a board of four, three of whom found him professionally, morally, and mentally qualified for promotion, one member of the board dissenting. The findings went back to the Secretary of the Navy, were reviewed by the Judge-Advocate-General's office, were sent back to the examining board for reconsideration, with the practical instruction to the board to find against Lieutenant McAlpine. In pursuance of that recommendation Lieutenant McAlpine was dropped from the Navy with one year's pay. I introduced at the succeeding Congress a bill reinstating him in the Navy. The bill was referred to the then Secretary of the Navy, Paul Morton, who investigated the matter and reported back to the Committee on Naval Affairs that a great injustice had been done this officer and that he should be at once restored to the service.

On March 3, 1905, this House passed a bill which had the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs to reinstate Lieutenant McAlpine in the service. That bill, introduced by me, put him at the head of the list of lieutenants, because it looked to be the line of least resistance. Had the bill been introduced to put him in the service where he would have been except for this unfortunate circumstance, the bill would have passed the House as introduced. The fault was in drawing the bill that he did not get his old place.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman have read the letter of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. MAYNARD. Paul Morton? I do not think that is here. That was when they put him back into the Navy.

Mr. MANN. Is he in the Navy now?

Mr. MAYNARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then what is he kicking about?

Mr. MAYNARD. Because he has lost eighty numbers.

Mr. MANN. Well, he is in great luck to be in the Navy, any way. What is he now?

Mr. MAYNARD. A lieutenant-commander.

Mr. MANN. At what salary?

Mr. MAYNARD. At the salary of lieutenant-commander.

Mr. MANN. But that varies.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to have read the letter of Admiral Rae, Chief of the Bureau of Engineers. This gentleman has been selected by the Bureau of Navigation——

The SPEAKER. The letter can not be read in less than two minutes, and that is the time set for the special order of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. We can not pass bills here, Mr. Speaker, without a proper report.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the announcement that at the close of the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill I will call up for consideration the pension appropriation bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SABATH, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of death in the family.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1574. An act to create the Calaveras Big Tree National Forest, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 4797. An act for the care and preservation of the Hermitage—to the Committee on the Library.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 3923. An act to fix the limitation applicable in certain cases;

H. R. 6195. An act to authorize A. J. Smith and his associates to erect a dam across the Choctawhatchee River in Dale County, Ala.; and

H. R. 15247. An act to authorize the Idaho and Northwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge across the Spokane River, near the city of Coeur d'Alene, Idaho.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE CAMPBELL SLEMP OF VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Clerk will read the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That at the hour of 2 o'clock p. m., on Saturday, March 7, legislative duties be suspended and eulogies on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. CAMPBELL SLEMP, late a Representative from Virginia, shall be in order.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the Hon. CAMPBELL SLEMP, late a Member of this House from the State of Virginia, and in pursuance of the order heretofore made, the business of the House be now suspended to enable his associates to pay fitting tribute to his high character and distinguished services.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LANGLEY). The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it becomes our duty to pause for a brief moment amid the busy scenes and active legislative work of this House to pay fitting tribute to the life and character of a departed colleague. Nothing has impressed me so painfully during my somewhat extended service in this body as the appalling frequency with which we are called upon to mourn the death of our Congressional associates, friends, and daily companions. Even before they had taken their seats, and entered upon the active duties of this Congress, two most distinguished and widely known Senators, each bearing a commission from the State of Alabama, passed serenely to their final rest, full of honors and of years. And scarcely had the grave closed over the mortal remains of another honored son of our beloved Southland, a distinguished Senator of the State of South Carolina, when, only three short days ago, the entire country was startled by the announcement that Senator REDFIELD PROCTOR, of Vermont, long a conspicuous figure in the councils of the nation, had suddenly been summoned to that "undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns." And although the visitations of death during this session have been less frequent in this Hall than in the other Chamber of Congress, two of its members, GEORGE W. SMITH, of Illinois, and CAMPBELL SLEMP, of Virginia, have answered their last earthly roll call and passed into the great beyond.

Of all the States of this Union none, within my personal knowledge of the membership of Congress, has been so stricken by the hand of death as has Virginia. Since the beginning of the first session of the Fifty-second Congress fourteen of those who at one time or another served that State in Congress have laid down the honors conferred upon them, as well as the cares and burdens of this life, and gone the way which those of us who for the time being are left behind must sooner or later travel.

Of these, Lee, who had been reelected, passed away before taking his seat in the Fifty-second Congress; but Barbour, Epes, Otey, Richard A. Wise, and Rixey died in the midst of their legislative duties and with the harness still on, whilst Edmonds, Meredith, Turner, Lawson, Walker, O'Ferrall, and George D. Wise lived to witness the termination of their Congressional careers and surrendered up their lives amid the peaceful scenes and quiet environments of their Virginia homes.

Such has been the mortality in the comparatively small delegation from the State of Virginia during the period in which I have, in part, had the honor to serve it here. The bare recital of stern realities so strikingly impressive as these can but serve to admonish the strongest and most heedless among us that life at best is beset by snares and full of uncertainties, and that "Death rides upon every passing breeze."

On Sunday, October 13, 1907, Col. CAMPBELL SLEMP, late a Representative from the Ninth Virginia District, died at his home at Big Stone Gap. His death was very sudden and came as a distinct shock to his many friends throughout Virginia and elsewhere.

My personal acquaintance with Colonel SLEMP began with the opening of the Fifty-eighth Congress, although I had long known of him as prominent in the politics of my State. Our homes were separated by the extreme length of the State, a distance of more than 500 miles. For these reasons I have been obliged to rely to a very large extent upon those whose fortune it was to know him longer and more intimately for most of the facts connected with his long and somewhat eventful life, which I shall now briefly present.

Colonel SLEMP's father, Sebastian Smith Slemp, was one of the foremost men of his section and a striking figure in his community. His mother, before her marriage, was Margaret Reasor, a member of one of the most prominent and well-known families in southwestern Virginia. Lee County is that extreme southwest section of the State running like a wedge for a number of miles between the State of Kentucky on the north and that of Tennessee on the south. Mountains rich with coal and ore there alternate with fertile valleys. Although to-day this county is justly regarded as one of the richest and most prosperous in the Commonwealth, conditions there were far different half a century ago. Then the railroads which now traverse every section of the county had not penetrated its fastnesses. Its inhabitants were cut off from the markets of the world, and the cattle for which that section of Virginia is now so widely famed were marketed in Baltimore, being driven many miles across the ranges of the Allegheny Mountains and up the Shenandoah Valley. Cattle raising and farming were the chief industries, and naturally the utter lack of transportation facilities and the almost inaccessibility of markets were not conducive to the rapid development of material wealth. What such environments and conditions did develop was something infinitely better—a strong, hardy, self-reliant, and thoroughly independent manhood, and this doubtless largely accounts for the untiring energy, indomitable will, perfect self-reliance, and strong, practical common sense which in after life contributed no little to the business successes and the political achievements of Colonel SLEMP.

The educational facilities of Lee County were very limited in those days, and so it was that his parents sent the subject of my remarks at an early age to Emory and Henry College, in Washington County, where most of the young men of that day and section were educated. Here young SLEMP applied himself assiduously to his studies; but the death of his father necessitated his return to his home three months before graduation. He was not permitted to remain there long, for the great conflict between the States was rapidly approaching, and having decided to cast his fortunes with those of his native State, although scarcely of age, he proceeded to raise a company, which was soon thereafter mustered into the service of the State and of the Confederacy. Whilst guarding the mountain passes leading from Kentucky into Virginia, Captain SLEMP's command was opposed to that of Colonel Garfield, afterwards the martyr President of the United States. Later he served with his command in Kentucky. On his return to Virginia he organized the Sixty-fourth Virginia Regiment, of which he became the commanding officer, serving with it in southwestern Virginia, East Tennessee, and East Kentucky. Under General Marshall he participated in the raid through eastern Kentucky, and later he was ordered with his command to Chickamauga, but before his preparations had been completed the order was countermanded. His military services practically ended at Cumberland Gap, where the entire command of General Frasier, of which his regiment formed a part, was surrendered to the Union forces.

The war ended, Colonel SLEMP returned to his home in Lee County. He had married Miss Nancy Brittain Cawood, of Owsley County, Ky., in the year 1864, whilst serving in that State, and having arranged to purchase the old Slemp homestead, he resolutely set to work to earn a livelihood for himself and family and to lay the foundations for the handsome competency which he later accumulated. There was still small opportunity for the accumulation of wealth in that isolated section, but by perseverance and industry and the exercise of that intelligence and fine business instinct which characterized his entire career as a man of affairs, he soon won for himself a commanding position in the industrial life of his section.

In 1878 Colonel SLEMP was elected to the house of delegates of Virginia, where he became an ardent advocate of the readjustment of the State's indebtedness, and where he numbered among his intimate friends such prominent leaders of that then popular movement as Gen. William Mahone, Senator H. H. Riddleberger, and Hon. John E. Massie. He was reelected to the house of delegates by a largely increased majority in 1880. Up to this time Colonel SLEMP was a Democrat in politics, but he subsequently, along with General Mahone and other prominent readjusters, became affiliated with the Republican party, to which political organization he ever afterwards gave his allegiance.

In 1883 he was a candidate for the State senate, but was defeated by a small majority, since many of his old friends and supporters among the readjusters—that issue having been settled—returned to the Democratic fold.

In 1890 he received the Republican nomination for lieutenant-governor on the unsuccessful ticket headed by General Mahone. The canvass which he made, however, brought him into State prominence, and thereafter he was frequently honored by his party, having more than once occupied the position of elector on its Presidential tickets.

In 1902 he was elected a Representative in Congress from the Ninth Congressional District, and he was twice thereafter reelected by increased majorities, but in each of these three contests he was vigorously opposed, and only succeeded in winning the election after a bitterly contested campaign. It is safe, therefore, to affirm that the Ninth District has never witnessed harder fought political battles than the three from which Colonel SLEMP emerged as victor.

As the sole Representative of his party in Congress from Virginia, he was selected by President Roosevelt as the Republican referee for the entire State, and thus it was that his time became largely occupied in dispensing Federal patronage. That he could under circumstances such as these give any considerable attention to his official and public duties is really to be wondered at, and yet at least one of his committee assignments demanded of him constant application and untiring work. He laid no claims to the graces and gifts of oratory and he made no speeches in Congress, but he was a laborious worker, and his intensely practical mind and strong powers of application enabled him to accomplish much in the way of legislation.

It is no small tribute to Colonel SLEMP's tactfulness as a man and to his skill and ability as a political leader that his absolute supremacy was never seriously contested by his party associates and that his party leadership was universally recognized and generally accepted throughout the State of Virginia, as well as in the district of which he was the actual Representative in Congress. That, as the sole dispenser of great Federal patronage in his State, he did not incite bitter opposition to his leadership in his party is also a high tribute to his political sagacity and to his adroitness as a leader of men.

Colonel SLEMP was preeminently a man of action. In business, as in politics, he was ever aggressive, and in both was exceptionally successful. It is said of him that he fought for everything in life which he obtained that was worth the having, and that he owed the eminence which he attained in politics to constant effort and persistent warfare.

For forty years he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South and a firm believer in its teachings, and, I am told, always a liberal contributor toward its support.

That he was steadfast and loyal to his friends and unflinchingly firm in his convictions is the judgment of those who knew him well, and I can bear cheerful and willing testimony that in all his relations to his colleagues he was uniformly courteous and ever regardful of their feelings. His bearing toward them was both unostentatious and unassuming, and in his intercourse with his fellow Members he was at all times genial and open-hearted. Politically, he and I were very far apart, and as to most of the great public questions now before the country we differed widely and radically, but personally our relations were most cordial and friendly and therefore it is that I have availed myself of this opportunity to speak of his life and achievements and to pay an humble tribute of respect to his memory.

To the keeping of those who loved him in life, and by whom his memory will ever be cherished, has been surrendered the record of his long, earnest life—a life full of effort and achievement. To them that record will ever remain a priceless inheritance and a sacred possession.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, those men whose lives are spent in a struggle to advance the principles in which they believe, against their own personal interests, at a sacrifice of their own comfort and with scant hope of success, must always command not merely our respect, but our intense admiration.

The difference in our ages precluded any very intimate acquaintance and association between Colonel SLEMP and myself. My personal acquaintance with him was limited to the Fifty-eighth Congress and Fifty-ninth Congress, during which we were both Members of this House. It falls therefore more properly to others than to me to review his career minutely. His entire history, however, was one of unselfish devotion to principle and indomitable determination to fight for his opinions, without regard to his interests. Taking first the company of which he was captain, then the regiment of which he was colonel, into the service of the Confederacy, a service which could appeal to no property interest of himself or of his mountaineer neighbors who followed him, he gave, when scarce more than a boy, an example of his capacity for leadership and his devotion to what he deemed to be right, characteristic not only of his life, but marking him unmistakably as a type of his section. Emerging from the poverty in which the war left him, by the avocations of the school-teacher and farmer he again presents himself as typical of the class and section to which he belonged. No one less responsive to the demands of duty, no one less obedient to the dictates of conscience, no one less disposed to disregard his own interests, his own ease and comfort at the call of conviction could by any possibility have lived such a life as his.

Knowing something in a large way of his history, and having known many men of his type in my own State, I was prepared to understand him perhaps better than most Members of this House. And so, not knowing him very well personally, I still took a deep interest in his career, recognizing in him a conspicuous type of a section and a people whose history has not yet been written.

Casting his lot as a young man with the Confederacy, on the side of the State against the great majority of his country, because he deemed his duty to be that way, he allied himself during his mature years to that political party which did not meet with the concurrence of the majority of the people of his State. The proprieties and my disposition on such an occasion prevent my saying anything partisan or political in its nature. But our admiration for courage, for determination, for devotion to a cause without regard to success, compel equal admiration for the men possessing those qualities whether they be Confederates at Appomattox or Republicans in the South. It is a part of his history that when the troops of which his regiment was a part were to be surrendered, he secured the permission of the general commanding to take his regiment and attempt their escape. Dividing what was left of his regiment into groups of seven, they made their way along the mountain side from Cumberland Gap to a place of safety, Colonel SLEMP and his immediate friends being the last to escape, and so were beyond the Union lines when the Confederate troops were surrendered. When the war was over, he and his regiment ceased to fight, but they had not surrendered.

The same spirit characterized him as a party leader. From every standpoint of interest, business and social, such a political fight as he made was not easy. No man becomes or can become a leader in such a movement who consults either his fears or his love of ease. It is a leadership which belongs only to those men cast in such a mold that they can fight for their principles without reference to the result. Under such conditions those who count the cost either do not enter the controversy or enter it upon another side. There must have been many times during his long party leadership when Colonel SLEMP longed for the greater ease he had known amidst the failing fortunes of the Confederacy.

But mere blind courage, however admirable, will not suffice for such leadership. Sound judgment, untiring energy, infinite patience, and tact are alike necessary. No man can accomplish anything in such a controversy unless he possesses also those qualities which inspire the highest personal devotion and friendship. Such devotion and friendship are found only by those who in turn are true to their friends; and it is perhaps this trait of Colonel SLEMP's character of which those who knew him will most frequently think as they recall his memory. And this conspicuous loyalty of friends and to friends is the only compensation for a life of such struggle at all commensurate with the labor required and the sacrifices entailed. The ardent devotion of his followers was to Colonel SLEMP, as death terminated his long fight for his principles, the chief recompense for his efforts in a cause in which leadership is at once a martyrdom and a triumph.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, Hon. CAMPBELL SLEMP was born in Lee County, Va., on December 2, 1839.

He was educated in the common schools of Virginia of that day and at the Emory and Henry College, where most of the young men of southwest Virginia completed their education at that period.

With the hardy, virile, and independent spirit characteristic of mountain environment, and with the advantages of a somewhat extensive academic training, the inference would be natural that his career would be exceptional; and so it proved.

He entered the Confederate army in 1861, when just of age, as captain, and was subsequently promoted to lieutenant-colonel and colonel.

He was a Democrat until 1879, when the debt question split the party of the State. The issue was upon what was the just and equitable indebtedness of Virginia upon the debt contracted many years before the war for internal improvements.

While there was room for honest differences of opinion as to the right and equities in the case, the controversy was a most unhappy one for Virginia, especially so coming as it did at a period when the State was still crippled by the disasters and impoverishment of a long and devastating war and still agitated and unsettled by the dark problem of reconstruction.

Gen. William Mahone, who was afterwards United States Senator, was the leader of the section of the Democratic party in favor of readjusting the debt, which section acquired the title of "Readjuster party." Colonel SLEMP cast his fortunes with this party and was elected as its representative to the house of delegates in 1879, and again in 1881. In 1880 he supported the Mahone-Hancock-English presidential ticket, and subsequently went with General Mahone into the Republican party, and in 1883 was the candidate of this party for the State senate, but was defeated.

In 1889 he was nominated by the Republican party of the State for lieutenant-governor upon the ticket headed by General Mahone for governor. This ticket was overwhelmingly defeated by the Democratic ticket led by Governor Philip W. McKinney.

Mr. SLEMP was not again a candidate for an office until 1902, when he was nominated by the Republicans of the Ninth Virginia district for Congress and was elected.

This district has from time to time been an uncertain and fluctuating political quantity—now Republican, now Democratic.

But in 1894 the powerful figure of Gen. James A. Walker, the last commander of the Stonewall Brigade, loomed up as the leader of the Republican party in the district. He was a man of commanding ability, of strong personality, of undaunted courage, and of overbearing will. In 1894 and 1896 he swept all opposition before him and carried the district by large majorities.

In 1898 the Democrats nominated a man who was of forceful and aggressive personality. His intellect was as strong, his will as imperious, and his courage as dauntless as were those of James A. Walker. The entire State watched the issue expectantly, for it was known that it would be "Greek meets Greek" when James A. Walker and William F. Rhea tried conclusions upon the hustings.

It was the custom in Virginia, in districts that were at all close, for the candidates of the respective parties to engage in joint discussions. Such discussions were arranged between Rhea and Walker. They proved to be intensely dramatic and interesting, and, at times, reached the danger point. The general opinion was that Rhea got the better of his opponent in these discussions, and he was elected, and again in 1900 he overthrew the same antagonist.

In 1902 the Republicans nominated Colonel SLEMP. He conducted a still-hunt campaign against Congressman Rhea, and succeeded in defeating him by a majority of 218. The defeat of such a man as Rhea reveals, without the telling, the fact of Colonel SLEMP's popularity, influence, and power in his district.

Colonel SLEMP was reelected in 1904 over Hon. J. C. Wysor, one of the ablest lawyers and most brilliant orators in Virginia, by a majority of over 4,000; and was again elected in 1906, defeating ex-State Senator Robert P. Bruce, a splendid young Democrat, by a large majority.

As a Member of this House he made many friends by his genial manners and his kindly sympathies. His career here was quiet and unobtrusive; yet it was signalized by such untiring industry and eminent good sense that it redounded not only to the benefit of his district, but to the aggrandizement of the Republican party in the entire State.

Mr. Speaker, to the reflective mind there is an element of pathos in every life. However, the candidate for earth's honors and ambitions may gird himself with the panoply of preparation, how eagerly soever he may stand expectant for the steed of opportunity; how exultantly soever he may vault into the saddle and ride in triumph to the coveted goal, yet in every case "does black care ride behind."

This is the dispensation to universal humanity; and I can pay no higher tribute to this House than in recalling that its generous and tender usage has always been to bury all memories of strife and contention in the grave of a colleague. We all look forward to this; and we shall not be disappointed.

"There is no pocket in a shroud." There are no politics in the tomb.

Those who have sat with us in this Chamber, and are gone from among men, we remember with chastened and kindly hearts.

And so of our departed colleague we all unite in saying, "Honor to his memory; peace to his ashes."

Mr. LASSITER. Mr. Speaker, I did not have the honor of serving in this House with our deceased colleague, nor did I have the privilege of the personal acquaintance of Colonel SLEMP. Our residences have been in widely separated parts of the State. Yet I can bear testimony that for many years his name echoed loudly in the Commonwealth and his activities have been notable in the recent history of Virginia.

I shall leave to my colleagues and to his more intimate political associates a proper survey of his public services and personal merits.

That he was a brave and masterful man is evident not only from his local achievements, but from the confidence reposed in him by the Federal Administration.

In an hour like this, when the divine mystery of death overshadows human ambition and shames the animosities of men, it is reassuring to those who love our country to recognize the high qualities of mind or heart which have always characterized the representatives of the American people.

The regard which I entertain for the son and successor of our late colleague, as well as the honor due to a gentleman who has borne the mandate of a Virginian constituency to represent its wishes in this Hall, impels me to say a word of personal sympathy to the living and respect to the memory of the dead.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, Colonel SLEMP was one of almost 10,000 representative Americans who have given conspicuous service to their country in this House. His services here were not distinguished upon the floor. He was not a debater, but one acquainted with the duties of a Member of this House well knows that much arduous work is done here that is not evidenced upon the floor. Colonel SLEMP was referee for all the political patronage of the State of Virginia. That of itself is a sufficient burden for the shoulders of any man, however great. That he did this work and did it well is evidenced by the fact that he was returned to this House one session after another for three consecutive terms, at a time when he had at his disposal all the Federal patronage within his State. In addition to all of this, Colonel SLEMP had the work of a Member of this body that is required in the Departments here, and everyone who has had service in this House knows how arduous that service is and how burdensome it sometimes becomes. A visit to two or three Departments a day, keeping up the enormous correspondence that is necessary, requires a degree of industry that is not required of men in the average walks of life. He was a man of patient industry and did his work faithfully and well. My acquaintance with Colonel SLEMP began in the work of one of the busiest committees in the House, that on the District of Columbia. The work there is similar to the work that is required of the common council of a city of the size of Washington. Mr. SLEMP was always at his post. He was wise as a counselor on civic affairs, always ready to devote himself to duty, and never shrank from a single responsibility. He lived the life of a busy man. He was born to a life of struggle and contention. He endured the trials of war and reconstruction in his younger manhood. Virginia had problems after Appomattox. Colonel SLEMP took them up and assisted in adjusting them all. He met and was equal to every responsibility that rested upon him as a citizen. He did his duty as he saw it. No man can do more, and no higher tribute can be paid to a citizen of this country or to a Member of this House than to say of him that he did his duty faithfully as he saw it.

Colonel SLEMP has experimented with the problem of life and has solved the great mystery of death. He, like all the innumerable multitude who have preceded him to the grave, was cheered with the hope of victory and depressed with the fear of defeat; he was able to gratify a lofty ambition and win in many of life's notable conflicts, but when the great summons came he yielded, as all men must. To that summons no man can say nay. Life, with its hopes, with its fears, with its ambitions, with its conquests, and its defeats, must end. 'Tis the fate of all. Every man, whatever his hopes, may look forward to the time when he, too, shall answer to the summons that calls to the grave. Position, place, and power are not a defense. Ambition, achievement, and responsibility are not a bar. From the cradle to the grave life is a conflict with death. The infant struggles for life in its beginning, and finds it a struggle throughout to the end, when the mystery of death solves the last problem of life—

E'en silent night proclaims my soul immortal;
E'en silent night proclaims eternal day.

In this hope death loses its sting and the grave its victory.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, for the fifth time in twice as many years the Virginia Representatives in this House are called upon to pay tribute to the character and public services of a deceased colleague. The death of one-half of their number in a decade suggests the old, old thought that "in the midst of life we are in death." These deaths have come to the young and middle-aged as well as to the old. They are solemn and stern reminders that the youngest and strongest may be called away at any hour, and that the oldest among us would do well to so carry ourselves in life that our goods and chattels may be packed and ready for the departure we must soon make.

These frequent deaths remind us of a passage in one of Thackeray's letters. He was referring to a friend who had died, and he wrote:

He was ready, I suppose, and had his passport made out for his journey. Next comes our little turn to pack up and depart. To stay is well enough, but shall we be very sorry to go? What more is there in life that we haven't tried? What that we have tried is so very much worth repetition or endurance? I have just come from a beefsteak and potatoes and a bottle of claret, both excellent of their kind, but we can part from them without a very severe pang, and note that we shall get no greater pleasures than these from this time till the end of our days. What is a greater pleasure? Gratified ambition? Accumulation of money? What?

We have the answer in a Latin maxim: "Vanitas, vanitatem;" or, from the theologian's standpoint—

Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher; all is vanity.
